M.DCC.XC. ESTADO MAIGR DO EXERCITO

N OF

IT may not be unnecessary to inform the Reader, that the following Reflections had their origin in a correspondence between the Author and a very young gentleman at Paris, who did him the bonour of desiring his opinion upon the important transactions, which then, and ever since, have so much occupied the attention of all men. An answer was written some time in the month of October 1789; but it was kept back upon prudential confiderations. That letter is alluded to in the beginning of the following sheets. It has been since forwarded to the person to whom it was addressed. The reasons for the delay in sending it were assigned in a short letter to the same gentleman. This produced on his part a new and pressing application for the Author's sentiments.

The Author began a second and more full discussion on the subject. This he had some thoughts of publishing early in the last spring; but the matter gaining upon him, he found that what he had undertaken not only far exceeded the measure of a letter, but that its importance required rather a more detailed consideration than at that time he had any leisure to bestow upon it. However, having thrown down his first thoughts in the form of a letter, and indeed when he sat down to write, having intended rational liberty, and that I think you bound, in all honest policy, to provide a permanent body, in which that spirit may reside, and an effectual organ, by which it may act, it is my misfortune to entertain great doubts concerning feveral material points in your late transactions.

You imagined, when you wrote last, that I might possibly be reckoned among the approvers of certain proceedings in France, from the folemn public feal of fanction they have received from two clubs of gentlemen in London, called the Conflitutional Society, and the Revolution

Society.

I certainly have the honour to belong to more clubs than one, in which the constitution of this kingdom and the principles of the glorious Revolution, are held in high reverence: and I reckon myself among the most forward in my zeal for maintaining that constitution and those principles in their utmost purity and vigour. It is because I do so, that I think it necessary for me, that there should be no mistake. Those who cultivate the memory of our revolution, and those who are attached to the constitution of this kingdom, will take good care how they are involved with persons who, under the pretext of zeal towards the Revolution and Constitution, too frequently wander from their true principles; and are ready on every occasion to depart from the firm but cautious and deliberate spirit which produced the one, and which prefides in the other. Before I proceed to answer the more material particulars particulars in your letter, I shall beg leave to give you such information as I have been able to obtain of the two clubs which have thought proper, as bodies, to interfere in the concerns of France; first assuring you, that I am not, and that I have never been, a member of either of those societies.

The first, calling itself the Constitutional So. ciety, or Society for Constitutional Information, or by fome fuch title, is, I believe, of feven or eight years standing. The institution of this fociety appears to be of a charitable, and fo far of a laudable, nature: it was intended for the circulation, at the expence of the members, of many books, which few others would be at the expence of buying; and which might lie on the hands of the bookfellers, to the great loss of an useful body of men. Whether the books fo charitably circulated, were ever as charitably read, is more than I know. Possibly feveral of them have been exported to France; and, like goods not in request here, may with you have found a market. I have heard much talk of the lights to be drawn from books that are fent from hence. What improvements they have had in their passage (as it is said some liquors are meliorated by croffing the fea) I cannot tell: But I never heard a man of common judgment, or the least degree of information, speak a word in praise of the greater part of the publications circulated by that fociety; nor have their pro-B 2

themselves, as of any serious consequence.

Your National Affembly feems to entertain much the same opinion that I do of this poor charitable club. As a nation, you reserved the whole flock of your eloquent acknowledgments for the Revolution Society; when their fellows in the Constitutional were, in equity, entitled to fome share. Since you have selected the Revolution Society as the great object of your national thanks and praifes, you will think me excuseable in making its late conduct the subject of my observations. The National Affembly of France has given importance to these gentlemen by adopting them; and they return the favour, by acting as a fort of fub-committee in England for extending the principles of the National Affembly. Henceforward we must consider them as a kind of privileged persons; as no inconfiderable members in the diplomatic body. This is one among the revolutions which have given splendour to obscurity, and distinction to undiscerned merit. Until very lately I do not recollect to have heard of this club. I am quite fure that it never occupied a moment of my thoughts; nor, I believe, those of any person out of their own set. I find, upon enquiry, that on the anniversary of the Revolution in 1688, a club of diffenters, but of what denomination I know not, have long had the custom of hearing a fermon in one of their churches : churches; and that afterwards they spent the day cheerfully, as other clubs do, at the tavern. But I never heard that any public measure, or political system, much less that the merits of the constitution of any foreign nation, had been the subject of a formal proceeding at their sestivals; until, to my inexpressible surprize, I found them in a fort of public capacity, by a congratulatory address, giving an authoritative sanction to the proceedings of the National Assembly in France.

In the antient principles and conduct of the club, so far at least as they were declared, I see nothing to which I, or any sober man, could possibly take exception. I think it very probable, that for some purpose, new members may have entered among them; and that some truly christian politicians, who love to dispense benefits, but are careful to conceal the hand which distributes the dole, may have made them the instruments of their pious designs. Whatever I may have reason to suspect concerning private management, I shall speak of nothing as of a certainty, but what is public.

For one, I should be forry to be thought, directly or indirectly, concerned in their proceedings. I certainly take my full share, along with the rest of the world, in my individual and private capacity, in speculating on what has been done, or is doing, on the public stage; in any place antient or modern; in the republic of Rome, or the republic of Paris: but having no B 3 general general apostolical mission, being a citizen of a particular state, and being bound up in a considerable degree, by its public will, I should think it, at least improper and irregular, for me to open a formal public correspondence with the actual government of a foreign nation, without the express authority of the government under which I live.

I should be still more unwilling to enter into that correspondence, under any thing like an equivocal description, which to many, unacquainted with our ufages, might make the address, in which I joined, appear as the act of persons in fome fort of corporate capacity, acknowledged by the laws of this kingdom, and authorized to speak the sense of some part of it. On account of the ambiguity and uncertainty of unauthorized general descriptions, and of the deceit which may be practifed under them, and not from mere formality, the house of Commons would reject the most sneaking petition for the most trisling object, under that mode of signature to which you have thrown open the foldingdoors of your presence chamber, and have ushered into your National Assembly, with as much ceremony and parade, and with as great a buftle of applause, as if you had been visited by the whole representative majesty of the whole English nation. If what this fociety has thought proper to fend forth had been a piece of argument, it would have fignified little whose argument it was. It would be neither the more nor the less convincing on account of the party it came from. But this is only a vote and refolution. It stands folely on authority; and in this case it is the mere authority of individuals, few of whom appear. Their fignatures ought, in my opinion, to have been annexed to their instrument. The world would then have the means of knowing how many they are; who they are; and of what value their opinions may be, from their personal abilities, from their knowledge, their experience, or their lead and authority in this flate. To me, who am but a plain man, the proceeding looks a little too refined. and too ingenious; it has too much the air of a political ftratagem, adopted for the fake of giving, under an high-founding name, an importance to the public declarations of this club, which, when the matter came to be closely inspected, they did not altogether fo well deferve. It is a policy that has very much the complexion of a fraud.

I flatter myself that I love a manly, moral, regulated liberty as well as any gentleman of that society, be he who he will; and perhaps I have given as good proofs of my attachment to that cause, in the whole course of my public conduct. I think I envy liberty as little as they do, to any other nation. But I cannot stand forward, and give praise or blame to any thing which relates to human actions, and human concerns, on a simple view of the object, as it stands stripped of every relation, in all the nakedness and solitude of metaphysical abstraction. Circumstances (which with some gentlemen pass for nothing) give in reality to every political principle its diftinguishing colour, and discriminating effect. The circumftances are what render every civil and political fcheme beneficial or noxious to mankind. Abstractedly speaking, government, as well as liberty, is good; yet could I, in common fense, ten years ago, have felicitated France on her enjoyment of a government (for fhe then had a government) without enquiry what the nature of that government was, or how it was administered? Can I now congratulate the fame nation upon its freedom? Is it because liberty in the abstract may be classed amongst the blessings of mankind, that I am feriously to felicitate a madman, who has escaped from the protecting restraint and wholesome darkness of his cell, on his restoration to the enjoyment of light and liberty? Am I to congratulate an highwayman and murderer, who has broke prison, upon the recovery of his natural rights? This would be to act over again the fcene of the criminals condemned to the gallies, and their heroic deliverer, the metaphysic Knight of the Sorrowful Countenance.

When I fee the spirit of liberty in action, I fee a strong principle at work; and this, for a while, is all I can possibly know of it. The wild gas, the fixed air is plainly broke loose: but we ought to suspend our judgment until the first effervescence is a little subsided, till the liquor is cleared, and until we see something deeper than the agitation of a troubled and frothy furface. I must be tolerably sure, before I venture publicly to congratulate men upon a bleffing, that they have really received one. Flattery corrupts both the receiver and the giver; and adulation is not of more fervice to the people than to kings. I should therefore suspend my congratulations on the new liberty of France, until I was informed how it had been combined with government; with public force; with the discipline and obedience of armies; with the collection of an effective and well-diffributed revenue; with morality and religion; with the folidity of property; with peace and order; with civil and focial manners. All these (in their way) are good things too; and, without them, liberty is not a benefit whilft it lafts, and is not likely to continue long. The effect of liberty to individuals is, that they may do what they please: We ought to see what it will please them to do, before we risque congratulations, which may be foon turned into complaints. Prudence would dictate this in the case of separate insulated private men; but liberty, when men act in bodies, is power. Confiderate people before they declare themselves will observe the use which is made of power; and particularly of fo trying a thing as new power in new persons, of whose principles, tempers, and dispositions, they have little or no experience, and in ficuations where those who appear the most stirring in the scene may possibly not be the real movers.

All these considerations however were below the trafcendental dignity of the Revolution Society. Whilft I continued in the country, from whence I had the honour of writing to you, I had but an imperfect idea of their transactions. On my coming to town, I fent for an account of their proceedings, which had been published by their authority, containing a fermon of Dr. Price, with the Duke de Rochefaucault's and the Archbishop of Aix's letter, and feveral other documents annexed. The whole of that publication, with the manifest defign of connecting the affairs of France with those of England, by drawing us into an imitation of the conduct of the National Affembly, gave me a confiderable degree of uneafinefs. The effect of that conduct upon the power, credit, prosperity, and tranquillity of France, became every day more evident. The form of constitution to be fettled. for its future polity, became more clear. We are now in a condition to difcern, with tolerable exactness, the true nature of the object held up to our imitation. If the prudence of referve and decorum dictates filence in fome circumstances, in others prudence of an higher order may justify us in fpeaking our thoughts. The beginnings of confusion with us in England are at present feeble enough; but with you, we have feen an infancy still more feeble, growing by moments into a strength to heap mountains upon mountains, and to wage war with Heaven itself, Whenever our neighbour's house is on fire, it cannot cannot be amiss for the engines to play a little on our own. Better to be despised for too anxious apprehensions, than ruined by too consident a security.

Sollicitous chiefly for the peace of my own country, but by no means unconcerned for your's, I wish to communicate more largely, what was at first intended only for your private fatisfaction. I shall still keep your affairs in my eye, and continue to address myself to you. Indulging myself in the freedom of epistolary intercourse, I beg leave to throw out my thoughts, and express my feelings, just as they arise in my mind, with very little attention to formal method. I fet out with the proceedings of the Revolution Society; but I shall not confine myfelf to them. Is it possible I should? It looks to me as if I were in a great crisis, not of the affairs of France alone, but of all Europe, perhaps of more than Europe. All circumstances taken together, the French revolution is the most astonishing that has hitherto happened in the world. The most wonderful things are brought about in many inflances by means the most absurd and ridiculous; in the most ridiculous modes; and apparently, by the most contemptible inftruments. Every thing feems out of nature in this .ftrange chaos of levity and ferocity, and of all forts of crimes jumbled together with all forts of follies. In viewing this monstrous tragi-comic scene, the most opposite passions necessarily succeed, and sometimes mix with with each other in the mind; alternate contempt and indignation; alternate laughter and tears; alternate from and horror.

It cannot however be denied, that to some this strange scene appeared in quite another point of view. Into them it inspired no other sentiments than those of exultation and rapture. They saw nothing in what has been done in France, but a sirm and temperate exercion of freedom; so consistent, on the whole, with morals and with piety, as to make it deserving not only of the secular applause of dashing Machiavelian politicians, but to render it a fit theme for all the devout effusions of sacred eloquence.

On the forenoon of the 4th of November last, Doctor Richard Price, a non-conforming minister of eminence, preached at the diffenting meetinghouse of the Old Jewry, to his club or fociety, a very extraordinary miscellaneous fermon, in which there are fome good moral and religious fentiments, and not ill expressed, mixed up in a fort of porridge of various political opinions and reflections: but the revolution in France is the grand ingredient in the cauldron. I confider the address transmitted by the Revolution Society to the National Affembly, through Earl Stanhope, as originating in the principles of the fermon, and as a corollary from them. It was moved by the preacher of that discourse. It was passed by those who came reeking from the effect of the fermon, without any cenfure or qualification, expressed or implied. If, however, any of the gentlemen concerned shall wish to separate the sermon from the resolution, they know how to acknowledge the one, and to disayow the other. They may do it: I cannot.

For my part, I looked on that fermon as the public declaration of a man much connected with literary caballers, and intriguing philosophers; with political theologians, and theological politicians, both at home and abroad. I know they fet him up as a fort of oracle; because, with the best intentions in the world, he naturally philippizes, and chaunts his prophetic fong in exact unifon with their deligns.

That fermon is in a strain which I believe has not been heard in this kingdom, in any of the pulpits which are tolerated or encouraged in it, fince the year 1648, when a predeceffor of Dr. Price, the Reverend Hugh Peters, made the vault of the king's own chapel at St. James's ring with the honour and privilege of the Saints, who, with the "high praises of God in their mouths, and a " two edged fword in their hands, were to execute "judgment on the heathen, and punishments " upon the people; to bind their kings with chains, " and their nobles with fetters of iron *." Few harangues from the pulpit, except in the days of your league in France, or in the days of our folemn league and covenant in England, have ever breathed less of the spirit of moderation than this lecture in the Old Jewry. Supposing, however, that fomething like moderation were vifible in this political fermon; yet politics and the pulpit are terms that have little agreement. No found ought to be heard in the church but the healing voice of Christian charity. The cause of civil liberty and civil government gains as little as that of religion by this confusion of duties. Those who quit their proper character, to affume what does not belong to them, are, for the greater part, ignorant both of the character they leave, and of the character they affume. Wholly unacquainted with the world in which they are fo fond of meddling, and inexperienced in all its affairs, on which they pronounce with fo much confidence, they have nothing of politics but the passions they excite. Surely the church is a place where one day's truce ought to be allowed to the diffensions and animosities of mankind.

This pulpit style, revived after so long a discontinuance, had to me the air of novelty, and of a novelty not wholly without danger. I do not charge this danger equally to every part of the discourse. The hint given to a noble and reverend lay-divine, who is supposed high in office in one of our universities*, and to other lay-divines " of "renk and literature," may be proper and seasonable, though somewhat new. If the noble Seekers should find nothing to satisfy their pious sancies in the old staple of the national church, or in all the rich variety to be found in the wellafforted warehouses of the diffenting congregations, Dr. Price advises them to improve upon non-conformity; and to fet up, each of them, a separate meeting-house upon his own particular principles*. It is fomewhat remarkable that this reverend divine should be so earnest for setting up new churches, and so perfectly indifferent concerning the doctrine which may be taught in them. His zeal is of a curious character. It is not for the propagation of his own opinions, but of any opinions. It is not for the diffusion of truth, but for the spreading of contradiction. Let the noble teachers but diffent, it is no matter from whom or from what. This great point once fecured, it is taken for granted their religion will be rational and manly. I doubt whether religion would reap all the benefits which the calculating divine computes from this "great company of great preachers." It would certainly be a valuable addition of nondescripts to the ample collection of known classes, genera and species, which at present beautify the bortus figeus of dissent. A sermon from a noble duke,

^{* &}quot;Those who dislike that mode of worship which is pre"feribed by public authority ought, if they can find no wor"sthip out of the church which they approve, to set up a duke, or a noble marquis, or a noble earl, or baron bold, would certainly increase and diversify the amusements of this town, which begins to grow fatiated with the uniform round of its vapid diffipations. I should only stipulate that these new Mess-fobns in robes and coronets should keep some fort of bounds in the democratic and levelling principles which are expected from their titled pulpits. The new evangelists will, I dare fay, disappoint the hopes that are conceived of them. They will not become, literally as well as figuratively, polemic divines, nor be disposed so to drill their congregations that they may, as in former bleffed times, preach their doctrines to regiments of dragoons, and corps of infantry and artillery. Such arrangements, however favourable to the caufe of compulsory freedom, civil and religious, may not be equally conducive to the national tranquillity. These few restrictions I hope are no great stretches of intolerance, no very violent exertions of despotisin.

But I may fay of our preacher, "utinam nugis" tota illa dedistet tempora sevitiæ." — All things in this his fulminating bull are not of so innoxious a tendency. His doctrines affect our constitution in its vital parts. He tells the Revolution Society, in this political sermon, that his majesty "is almost the only lawful king in the "world, because the only one who owes his "crown to the choice of his people." As to the kings of the world, all of whom (except one) this archponess of the rights of men, with all the plenitude, plenitude, and with more than the boldness of the papal deposing power in its meridian fervour of the twelfth century, puts into one sweeping clause of ban and anathema, and proclaims usurpers by circles of longitude and latitude, over the whole globe, it behoves them to consider how they admit into their territories these apostolic missionaries, who are to tell their subjects they are not lawful kings. That is their concern. It is ours, as a domestic interest of some moment, feriously to consider the solidity of the only principle upon which these gentlemen acknowledge a king of Great Britain to be entitled to their allegiance.

This doctrine, as applied to the pringe now on the British throne, either is nonsense, and therefore neither true nor false, or it affirms a most unfounded, dangerous, illegal, and unconftitutional position. According to this spiritual doctor of politics, if his majesty does not owe his crown to the choice of his people, he is no lawful king. Now nothing can be more untrue than that the crown of this kingdom is fo held by his majesty. Therefore if you follow their rule, the king of Great Britain, who most certainly does not owe his high office to any form of popular election, is in no respect better than the rest of the gang of usurpers, who reign, or rather rob, all over the face of this our miferable world, without any fort of right or title to the allegiance of their people. The policy of this general doctrine, fo qualified, is evident enough.

The propagators of this political gospel are in hopes their abstract principle (their principle that a popular choice is necessary to the legal exiftence of the fovereign magistracy) would be overlooked whilft the king of Great Britain was not affected by it. In the mean time the ears of their congregations would be gradually habituated to it, as if it were a first principle admitted without dispute. For the present it would only operate as a theory, pickled in the preferving juices of pulpit eloquence, and laid by for future use. Condo et compono quæ mox depromere possim. By this policy, whilft our government is foothed with a refervation in its favour, to which it has no claim, the fecurity, which it has in common with all governments, fo far as opinion is fecurity, is taken away.

Thus these politicians proceed, whilst little notice is taken of their doctrines; but when they come to be examined upon the plain meaning of their words and the direct tendency of their doctrines, then equivocations and flippery conftructions come into play. When they fay the king owes his crown to the choice of his people, and is therefore the only lawful fovereign in the world, they will perhaps tell us they mean to fay no more than that some of the king's predeceffors have been called to the throne by fome fort of choice; and therefore he owes his crown to the choice of his people. Thus, by a miferable fubterfuge, they hope to render their proposition safe, by rendering it nugatory.

nugatory. They are welcome to the afylum they feek for their offence, fince they take refuge in their folly. For, if you admit this interpretation, how does their idea of election differ from our idea of inheritance? And how does the fettlement of the crown in the Brunfwick line derived from James the first, come to legalize our monarchy, rather than that of any of the neighbouring countries? At fome time or other, to be fure, all the beginners of dynafties were chosen by those who called them to govern. There is ground enough for the opinion that all the kingdoms of Europe were, at a remote period, elective, with more or fewer limitations in the objects of choice; but whatever kings might have been here or elsewhere, a thousand years ago, or in whatever manner the ruling dynasties of England or France may have begun, the King of Great Britain is at this day king by a fixed rule of fuccession, according to the laws of his country; and whilft the legal conditions of the compact of fovereignty are performed by him (as they are performed) he holds his crown in contempt of the choice of the Revolution Society, who have not a fingle vote for a king amongst them, either individually or collectively; though I make no doubt they would foon erect themselves into an electoral college, if things were ripe to give effect to their claim. His majesty's heirs and successors, each in his time and order, will come to the crown with C₂ the

the fame contempt of their choice with which his majesty has succeeded to that he wears.

Whatever may be the success of evasion in explaining away the gross error of fast, which suppofes that his majesty (though he holds it in concurrence with the wishes) owes his crown to the choice of his people, yet nothing can evade their full explicit declaration, concerning the principle of a right in the people to choose, which right is directly maintained, and tenaciously adhered to. All the oblique infinuations concerning election bottom in this proposition, and are referable to it. Lest the foundation of the king's exclusive legal title should pass for a mere rant of adulatory freedom, the political Divine proceeds dogmatically to affert *, that by the principles of the Revolution the people of England have acquired three fundamental rights, all which, with him, compose one system, and lie together in one short sentence; namely, that we have acquired a right

- 1. "To choose our own governors."
- 2. "To cashier them for misconduct."
- 3. "To frame a government for ourselves."

This new, and hitherto unheard-of bill of rights, though made in the name of the whole people, belongs to those gentlemen and their faction only. The body of the people of England have no share in it. They utterly discaim it. They will refift the practical affertion of it with their lives and fortunes. They are bound to do fo by the laws of their country, made at the time of that very Revolution, which is appealed to in favour of the fictitious rights claimed by the fociety which abuses its name.

These gentlemen of the Old Jewry, in all their reasonings on the Revolution of 1688, have a revolution which happened in England about forty years before, and the late French revolution, fo much before their eyes, and in their hearts, that they are constantly confounding all the three together. It is necessary that we should separate what they confound. We must recall their erring fancies to the acts of the Revolution which we revere, for the discovery of its true principles. If the principles of the Revolution of 1688 are any where to be found, it is in the statute called the Declaration of Right. In that most wife, fober, and confiderate declaration, drawn up by great lawyers and great statesmen, and not by warm and inexperienced enthulialts, not one word is faid, nor one fuggestion made, of a general right " to choose our own governors; to cashier them for " misconduct; and to form a government for our-« felves."

This Declaration of Right (the act of the 1st of William and Mary, fest. 2. ch. 2.) is the corner-stone of our constitution, as reinforced, explained, improved, and in its fundamental principles for ever settled. It is called "An act for declaring the rights and liberties of the subject, and for

C 3 " fettling

" fettling the fuccession of the crown." You will observe, that these rights and this succession are declared in one body, and bound indissolubly together.

A few years after this period, a fecond opportunity offered for afferting a right of election to the crown. On the prospect of a total failure of iffue from King William, and from the Princefs, afterwards Queen Anne, the confideration of the fettlement of the crown, and of a further fecurity for the liberties of the people, again came before the legislature. Did they this fecond time make any provision for legalizing the crown on the fpurious Revolution principles of the Old Jewry? No. They followed the principles which prevailed in the Declaration of Right; indicating with more precision the persons who were to inherit in the Protestant line. This act also incorporated, by the fame policy, our liberties, and an hereditary succession in the same act. Instead of a right to choose our own governors, they declared that the succession in that line (the protestant line drawn from lames the First) was absolutely neceffary " for the peace, quiet, and fecurity of the " realm," and that it was equally urgent on them " to maintain a certainty in the succession thereof, " to which the fubjects may fafely have re-" course for their protection." Both these acts, in which are heard the unerring, unambiguous oracles of Revolution policy, instead of countenancing the delufive, gypfey predictions of a " right to choose our governors," prove to a demonstration a demonstration how totally adverse the wisdom of the nation was from turning a case of necessity into a rule of law.

Unquestionably there was at the Revolution, in the person of King William, a small and a ternporary deviation from the flrict order of a regular hereditary fuccession; but it is against all genuine principles of jurisprudence to draw a principle from a law made in a special case, and regarding an individual person. Privilegium non transit in exemplum. If ever there was a time favourable for establishing the principle, that a king of popular choice was the only legal king, without all doubt it was at the Revolution. Its not being done at that time is a proof that the nation was of opinion it ought not to be done at any time. There is no person so completely ignorant of our history, as not to know, that the majority in parliament of both parties were fo little disposed to any thing resembling that principle, that at first they were determined to place the vacant crown, not on the head of the prince of Orange, but on that of his wife Mary, daughter of King James, the eldest born of the iffue of that king, which they acknowledged as undoubtedly his. It would be to repeat a very trite flory, to recall to your memory all those circumstances which demonstrated that their accepting King William was not properly a choice; but, to all those who did not wish, in effect to recall King James, or to deluge their country in blood, and again to bring their religion, laws, C4 and liberties into the peril they had just escaped, it was an act of necessity, in the strictest moral sense in which necessity can be taken.

In the very act, in which for a time, and in a fingle case, parliament departed from the strict order of inheritance, in favour of a prince, who, though not next, was however very near in the line of fuccession, it is curious to observe how Lord Somers, who drew the bill called the Declaration of Right, has comported himfelf on that delicate occasion. It is curious to observe with what address this temporary folution of continuity is kept from the eye: whilst all that could be found in this act of necessity to countenance the idea of an hereditary succession is brought forward, and fostered, and made the most of, by this great man, and by the legislature who followed him. Quitting the dry, imperative style of an act of parliament, he makes the lords and commons fall to a pious, legislative ejaculation, and declare, that they confider it " as a marvellous providence, " and merciful goodness of God to this nation, " to preferve their faid majesties royal persons. " most happily to reign over us on the throne of " their ancestors, for which, from the bottom of "their hearts, they return their humblest thanks " and praifes."-The legislature plainly had in view the act of recognition of the first of Queen Elizabeth, Chap. 3d, and of that of James the First, Chap. 1st, both acts strongly declaratory of the inheritable nature of the crown; and in many parts they follow, with a nearly literal precision, the words and even the form of thanksgiving, which is found in these old declaratory statutes.

The two houses, in the act of king William, did not thank God that they had found a fair opportunity to affert a right to choose their own governors, much less to make an election the only lawful title to the crown. Their having been in a condition to avoid the very appearance of it, as much as possible, was by them considered as a providential escape. They threw a politic, well-wrought veil over every circumstance tending to weaken the rights, which in the meliorated order of fuccession they meant to perpetuate; or which might furnish a precedent for any future departure from what they had then fettled for ever. Accordingly, that they might not relax the nerves of their monarchy, and that they might preserve a close conformity to the practice of their ancestors, as it appeared in the declaratory statutes of queen Mary * and queen Elizabeth, in the next clause they vest, by recognition, in their majesties, all the legal prerogatives of the crown, declaring, "that in them they are most " fully, rightfully, and intirely invefted, incorpo-" rated, united, and annexed." In the clause which follows, for preventing questions, by reafon of any pretended titles to the crown, they declare (observing also in this the traditionary language, along with the traditionary policy of the nation, and repeating as from a rubric the language of the preceding acts of Elizabeth and James) that on the preferving " a certainty in the " succession thereof, the unity, peace, and tran- " quillity of this nation doth, under God, wholly " depend."

They knew that a doubtful title of fuccession would but too much refemble an election; and that an election would be utterly destructive of the " unity, peace, and tranquillity of this na-"tion," which they thought to be confiderations of some moment. To provide for these objects, and therefore to exclude for ever the Old Jewry doctrine of "a right to choose our own " governors," they follow with a clause, containing a most folemn pledge, taken from the preceding act of Queen Elizabeth, as folemn a pledge as ever was or can be given in favour of an hereditary fuccession, and as solemn a renunciation as could be made of the principles by this fociety imputed to them. "The lords " fpiritual and temporal, and commons, do, " in the name of all the people aforefaid, most " humbly and faithfully fubmit themselves, their beirs and posterities for ever; and do faith-" fully promise, that they will stand to, main-" tain, and defend their faid majesties, and " also the limitation of the crown, herein specified and contained, to the utmost of their powers," &c. &c.

So far is it from being true, that we acquired a right by the Revolution to elect our kings, that if we had possessed it before, the English nation did at that time most solemnly renounce and abdicate it, for themselves and for all their posterity for ever. These gentlemen may value themselves as much as they please on their whig principles; but I never desire to be thought a better whig than Lord Somers; or to understand the principles of the Revolution better than those by whom it was brought about; or to read in the declaration of right any misteries unknown to those whose penetrating style has engraved in our ordinances, and in our hearts, the words and spirit of that immortal law.

It is true that, aided with the powers derived from force and opportunity, the nation was at that time, in some sense, free to take what course it pleased for filling the throne; but only free to do fo upon the fame grounds on which they might have wholly abolished their monarchy, and every other part of their constitution. However they did not think fuch bold changes within their commission. It is indeed difficult, perhaps impossible, to give limits to the mere abstract competence of the supreme power, such as was exercised by parliament at that time; but the limits of a moral competence, subjecting, even in powers more indifputably fovereign, occasional will to permanent reason, and to the fleady maxims of faith, justice, and fixed fundamental policy, are perfectly intelligible, and perfectly perfectly binding upon those who exercise any authority, under any name, or under any title, in the state. The house of lords, for instance, is not morally competent to diffolve the house of commons; no, nor even to diffolve itself, nor to abdicate, if it would, its portion in the legiflature of the kingdom. Though a king may abdicate for his own person, he cannot abdicate for the monarchy. By as strong, or by a stronger reason, the house of commons cannot renounce its fhare of authority. The engagement and pact of fociety, which generally goes by the name of the constitution, forbids such invasion and such surrender. The constituent parts of a state are obliged to hold their public faith with each other. and with all those who derive any ferious interest under their engagaments, as much as the whole flate is bound to keep its faith with separate communities. Otherwife competence and power would foon be confounded, and no law be left but the will of a prevailing force. On this principle the fuccession of the crown has always been what it now is, an hereditary fucceffion by law: in the old line it was a fuccession by the common law; in the new by the statute law, operating on the principles of the common law, not changing the fubstance, but regulating the mode, and describing the persons. Both these descriptions of law are of the fame force, and are derived from an equal authority, emanating from the common agreement and original compact of the state, communi sponsione reipublicæ, and as such are equally binding binding on king, and people too, as long as the terms are observed, and they continue the same body politic.

It is far from impossible to reconcile, if we do not fuffer ourselves to be entangled in the mazes of metaphysic sophistry, the use both of a fixed rule and an occasional deviation; the sacredness of an hereditary principle of fuccession in our government, with a power of change in its application in cases of extreme emergency. Even in that extremity (if we take the measure of our rights by our exercise of them at the Revolution) the change is to be confined to the peccant part only; to the part which produced the neceffary deviation; and even then it is to be effected without a decomposition of the whole civil and political mass, for the purpose of originating a new civil order out of the first elements of fociety.

A state without the means of some change is without the means of its conservation. Without such means it might even risque the loss of that part of the constitution which it wished the most religiously to preserve. The two principles of conservation and correction operated strongly at the two critical periods of the Restoration and Revolution, when England found itself without a king. At both those periods the nation had lost the bond of union in their antient edifice; they did not, however, dissolve the whole sabric. On the contrary, in both cases they regenerated the deficient part of the old constitution through the parts which were not impaired. They kept these old parts exactly as they were, that the part recovered might be fuited to them. They acted by the ancient organized states in the shape of their old organization, and not by the organic molecula of a difbanded people. At no time, perhaps, did the fovereign legislature manifest a more tender regard to that fundamental principle of British constitutional policy, than at the time of the Revolution, when it deviated from the direct line of hereditary fuccession. The crown was carried fomewhat out of the line in which it had before moved; but the new line was derived from the fame stock. It was still a line of hereditary defcent; still an hereditary defcent in the same blood, though an hereditary descent qualified with protestantism. When the legislature altered the direction, but kept the principle, they flewed that they held it inviolable.

On this principle, the law of inheritance had admitted some amendment in the old time, and long before the æra of the Revolution. Some time after the conquest great questions arose upon the legal principles of hereditary descent. It became a matter of doubt, whether the heir per capita or the heir per sirpes was to succeed; but whether the heir per capita gave way when the heirdom per stirpes took place, or the Catholic heir when the Protestant was preferred, the inheritable principle survived with a fort of immortality through all transmigrations—mul-tofque per annos stat fortuna domus et avi numerantur avorum. This is the spirit of our constitution, not only in its settled course, but in all its revolutions. Whoever came in, or however he came in, whether he obtained the crown by law, or by force, the hereditary succession was either continued or adopted.

The gentlemen of the Society for Revolutions fee nothing in that of 1688 but the deviation from the constitution; and they take the deviation from the principle for the principle. They have little regard to the obvious confequences of their doctrine, though they must fee, that it leaves positive authority in very few of the politive inflitutions of this country. When fuch an unwarrantable maxim is once established, that no throne is lawful but the elective, no one act of the princes who preceded their æra of fictitious election can be valid. Do these theorists mean to imitate some of their predecessors, who dragged the bodies of our antient fovereigns out of the quiet of their tombs? Do they mean to attaint and disable backwards all the kings that have reigned before the Revolution, and confequently to stain the throne of England with the blot of a continual usurpation? Do they mean to invalidate, annul, or to call into question, together with the titles of the whole line of our kings, that great body of our statute law which passed under those whom they treat as usurpers? to annul laws of inestimable value to our liberties-of as great value value at least as any which have passed at or fince the period of the Revolution? If kings, who did not owe their crown to the choice of their people, had no title to make laws, what will become of the statute de tallagio non concedendo?-of the petition of right?-of the act of babeas corpus? Do these new doctors of the rights of men prefume to affert, that King James the Second, who came to the crown as next of blood, according to the rules of a then unqualified fuccession, was not to all intents and purposes a lawful king of England, before he had done any of those acts which were justly construed into an abdication of his crown? If he was not, much trouble in parliament might have been faved at the period these gentlemen commemorate. But King James was a bad king with a good title, and not an usurper. The princes who succeeded according to the act of parliament which fettled the crown on the electress Sophia and on her descendants, being Protestants, came in as much by a title of inheritance as King James did. He came in according to the law, as it flood at his accession to the crown; and the princes of the House of Brunswick came to the inheritance of the crown, not by election, but by the law, as it ftood at their feveral accessions of Protestant defcent and inheritance, as I hope I have shewn sufficiently.

The law by which this royal family is specifically destined to the succession, is the act of 2019 to 30 - sinsolf and or sular aldamithe

the 12th and 13th of King William. The terms of this act bind "us and our beirs, and our " posterity, to them, their beirs, and their poste-"rity," being Protestants, to the end of time, in the fame words as the declaration of right had bound us to the heirs of King William and Queen Mary. It therefore fecures both an hereditary crown and an hereditary allegiance. On what ground, except the conftitutional policy of forming an establishment to secure that kind of fuccession which is to preclude a choice of the people for ever, could the legislature have saftidiously rejected the fair and abundant choice which our own country prefented to them, and fearched in strange lands for a foreign princess, from whose womb the line of our future rulers were to derive their title to govern millions of men through a feries of ages?

The Princess Sophia was named in the act of settlement of the 12th and 13th of King William, for a stock and root of inheritance to our kings, and not for her merits as a temporary administratrix of a power, which she might not, and in fact did not, herself ever exercise. She was adopted for one reason, and for one only, because, says the act, "the most excellent Princess Sophia, Electress and Dutchess Dowager of Hanover, is daughter of the most excellent Princess Elizabeth, late Queen of Bohemia, daughter of our late sovereign lord King James the First, of happy memory, and is hereby declared to be the next in succession

" in the Protestant line," &c. &c.; " and the crown shall continue to the beirs of her body, " being Protestants." This limitation was made by parliament, that through the Princess Sophia an inheritable line, not only was to be continued in future but (what they thought very material) that through her it was to be connected with the old stock of inheritance in King Iames the First; in order that the monarchy might preserve an unbroken unity through all ages, and might be preferved (with fafety to our religion) in the old approved mode by defcent, in which, if our liberties had been once endangered, they had often, through all florms and flruggles of prerogative and privilege, been preserved. They did well. No experience has taught us, that in any other course or method than that of an bereditary crown, our liberties can be regularly perpetuated and preferved facred as our hereditary right. An irregular, convulfive movement may be necessary to throw off an irregular, convulsive disease. But the course of succession is the healthy habit of the British constitution. Was it that the legislature wanted, at the act for the limitation of the crown in the Hanoverian line, drawn through the female descendants of James the First, a due fense of the inconveniencies of having two or three, or possibly more, foreigners in succesfion to the British throne? No! - they had a due fense of the evils which might happen from fuch foreign rule, and more than a due fense of them.

them. But a more decifive proof cannot be given of the full conviction of the British nation, that the principles of the Revolution did not authorize them to elect kings at their pleasure, and without any attention to the antient fundamental principles of our government, than their continuing to adopt a plan of hereditary Protestant succession in the old line, with all the dangers and all the inconveniencies of its being a foreign line full before their eyes, and operating with the utmost force upon their minds.

A few years ago I should be ashamed to overload a matter, so capable of supporting itself, by the then unneceffary fupport of any argument; but this feditious, unconstitutional doctrine is now publicly taught, avowed, and printed. The diffike I feel to revolutions, the fignals for which have fo often been given from pulpits; the spifit of change that is gone abroad; the total contempt which prevails with you, and may come to prevail with us, of all antient institutions, when fet in opposition to a present sense of convenience, or to the bent of a prefent inclination; all these considerations make it not unadviseable, in my opinion, to call back our attention to the true principles of our own domestic laws; that you, my French friend, should begin to know, and that we should continue to cherish them. We ought not, on either side of the water, to fuffer ourselves to be imposed upon by the counterfeit wares which fome persons, by a D 2 double double fraud, export to you in illicit bottoms, as raw commodities of British growth though wholly alien to our foil, in order afterwards to smuggle them back again into this country, manufactured after the newest Paris sashion of an improved liberty.

The people of England will not ape the fashions they have never tried; nor go back to those which they have found mischievous on trial. They look upon the legal hereditary succession of their crown as among their rights, not as among their wrongs; as a benefit, not as a grievance; as a security for their liberty, not as a badge of servitude. They look on the frame of their commonwealth, such as it stands, to be of inestimable value; and they conceive the undifturbed succession of the crown to be a pledge of the stability and perpetuity of all the other members of our constitution.

I shall beg leave, before I go any further, to take notice of some paltry artifices, which the abettors of election as the only lawful title to the crown, are ready to employ, in order to render the support of the just principles of our constitution a task somewhat invidious. These sophisters substitute a sictious cause, and seigned personages, in whose favour they suppose you engaged, whenever you defend the inheritable nature of the crown. It is common with them to dispute as if they were in a conslict with some of those exploded fanatics of slavery, who someon the paintained, what I believe no creature now maintains, " that the crown is held by di-" vine, hereditary, and indefeafible right."-Thefe old fanatics of fingle arbitrary power dogmatized as if hereditary royalty was the only lawful government in the world, just as our new fanatics of popular arbitrary power, maintain that a popular election is the fole lawful fource of authority. The 'old prerogative enthusiasts, it is true, did speculate foolishly, and perhaps impioufly too, as if monarchy had more of a divine fanction than any other mode of government; and as if a right to govern by inheritance were in strictness indefeasible in every person, who should be found in the succession to a throne, and under every circumstance, which no civil or political right can be. But an abfurd opinion concerning the king's hereditary right to the crown does not prejudice one that is rational, and bottomed upon folid principles of law and policy. If all the abfurd theories of lawyers and divines were to vitiate the objects in which they are conversant, we should have no law, and no religion, left in the world. But an abfurd theory on one fide of a question forms no justification for alledging a false fact, or promulgating mischievous maxims on the other.

The fecond claim of the Revolution Society is "a right of cashiering their governors for "misconduct." Perhaps the apprehensions our ancestors entertained of forming such a precedent as that "of cashiering for misconduct," was the cause that the declaration of the act which implied the abdication of king James, was, if it had any fault, rather too guarded, and too circumstantial*. But all this guard, and all this accumulation of circumstances, serves to shew the spirit of caution which predominated in the national councils, in a situation in which men irritated by oppression, and elevated by a triumph over it, are apt to abandon themselves to violent and extreme courses: it shews the anxiety of the great men who influenced the conduct of affairs at that great event, to make the Revolution a parent of settlement, and not a nursery of suture revolutions.

No government could stand a moment, if it could be blown down with any thing so loose and indefinite as an opinion of "misconduct." They who led at the Revolution, grounded the virtual abdication of King James upon no such light and uncertain principle. They charged him with nothing less than a design, consirmed by a multitude of illegal overt acts, to subvert the Protestant church and state, and their fundamental, unquestionable laws and liberties: they charged him with having broken the original contract between king and people. This was

^{* &}quot;That King James the second, having endeavoured to "subvert the constitution of the kingdom, by breaking the "original contract between king and people, and by the advice of jesuits, and other wicked persons, having violated the fundamental laws, and having withdrawn himself out of the kingdom, hath abdicated the government, and the throne is thereby vacant."

more than miscondust. A grave and over-ruling necessity obliged them to take the step they took, and took with infinite reluctance, as under that most rigorous of all laws. Their trust for the future prefervation of the constitution was not in future revolutions. The grand policy of all their regulations was to render it almost impracticable for any future fovereign to compel the states of the kingdom to have again recourse to those violent remedies. They left the crown what, in the eye and estimation of law, it had ever been, perfectly irresponsible. In order to lighten the crown still further, they aggravated responsibility on ministers of state. By the statute of the 1st of king William, fest. 2d, called " the act for declaring the rights and liberties of the " subject, and for settling the succession of the " crown," they enacted, that the ministers should ferve the crown on the terms of that declaration. They fecured foon after the frequent meetings of parliament, by which the whole government would be under the constant inspection and active controul of the popular representative and of the magnates of the kingdom. In the next great constitutional act, that of the 12th and 13th of King William, for the further limitation of the crown, and better fecuring the rights and liberties of the subject, they provided, " that no " pardon under the great feal of England " fhould be pleadable to an impeachment by the " commons in parliament." The rule laid down for government in the Declaration of Right, D 4 the

the constant inspection of parliament, the practical claim of impeachment, they thought insinitely a better security not only for their constitutional liberty, but against the vices of administration, than the reservation of a right so difficult in the practice, so uncertain in the issue, and often so mischievous in the consequences, as that of " cashiering their governors."

Dr. Price, in this fermon*, condemns very properly the practice of gross, adulatory addresses to kings. Instead of this fulsome style, he proposes that his majesty should be told, on occasions of congratulation, that " he is to consider " himself as more properly the servant than "the fovereign of his people." For a compliment, this new form of address does not feem to be very foothing. Those who are servants, in name, as well as in effect, do not like to be told of their fituation, their duty, and their obligations. The flave, in the old play, tells his master, "Hec commemoratio est quasi exprobra-" tio." It is not pleasant as compliment; it is not wholesome as instruction. After all, if the king were to bring himself to echo this new kind of address, to adopt it in terms, and even to take the appellation of Servant of the People as his royal ftyle, how either he or we should be much mended by it, I cannot imagine. I have feen very affuming letters, figned, Your most obedient, humble fervant. The proudest domination that ever was endured on earth took a title of ftill greater humility than that which is now proposed for sovereigns by the Apostle of Liberty. Kings and nations were trampled upon by the soot of one calling himself "the Servant of Servants;" and mandates for deposing sovereigns were sealed with the signet of "the Fisherman."

I should have considered all this as no more than a fort of slippant vain discourse, in which, as in an unsavoury sume, several persons suffer the spirit of liberty to evaporate, if it were not plainly in support of the idea, and a part of the scheme of "cashiering kings for misconduct."

In that light it is worth fome observation.

Kings, in one fense, are undoubtedly the fervants of the people, because their power has no other rational end than that of the general advantage; but it is not true that they are, in the ordinary sense (by our constitution, at least) any thing like fervants; the effence of whose fituation is to obey the commands of some other, and to be removeable at pleasure. But the king of Great Britain obeys no other person; all other persons are individually, and collectively too, under him, and owe to him a legal obedience. The law, which knows neither to flatter nor to infult, calls this high magistrate, not our servant, as this humble Divine calls him, but " our fove-" reign Lord the King;" and we, on our parts, have learned to speak only the primitive language of the law, and not the confused jargon of their Babylonian pulpits.

As he is not to obey us, but as we are to obey obey the law in him, our conflitution has made no fort of provision towards rendering him, as a fervant, in any degree responsible. Our constitution knows nothing of a magistrate like the Justicia of Arragon; nor of any court legally appointed, nor of any process legally fettled for submitting the king to the responsibility belonging to all fervants. In this he is not diffinguished from the commons and the lords; who, in their feveral public capacities, can never be called to an account for their conduct; although the Revolution Society chooses to affert, in direct opposition to one of the wifeft and most beautiful parts of our constitution, that "a king is no more than the first " fervant of the public, created by it, and responce fible to it."

Ill would our ancestors at the Revolution have deserved their same for wisdom, if they had found no security for their freedom, but in rendering their government seeble in its operations, and precarious in its tenure; if they had been able to contrive no better remedy against arbitrary power than civil confusion. Let these gentlemen state who that representative public is to whom they will affirm the king, as a servant, to be responsible. It will be then time enough for me to produce to them the positive statute law which affirms that he is not.

The ceremony of cashiering kings, of which these gentlemen talk so much at their ease, can rarely, if ever, be performed without force. It then becomes a case of war, and not of constitution.

tution. Laws are commanded to hold their tongues amongst arms; and tribunals fall to the ground with the peace they are no longer able to uphold. The Revolution of 1688 was obtained by a just war, in the only case in which any war, and much more a civil war, can be just. " Justa " bella quibus necessaria." The question of dethroning, or, if these gentlemen like the phrase better, " cashiering kings, will always be, as it has always been, an extraordinary question of ftate, and wholly out of the law; a question (like all other questions of state) of dispositions, and of means, and of probable consequences, rather than of politive rights. As it was not made for common abuses, so it is not to be agitated by common minds. The fuperlative line of demarcation, where obedience ought to end, and resistance must begin, is faint, obscure, and not easily definable. It is not a single act, or a single event, which determines it. Governments must be abused and deranged indeed, before it can be thought of; and the prospect of the future must be as bad as the experience of the past. When things are in that lamentable condition, the nature of the difease is to indicate the remedy to those whom nature has qualified to administer in extremities this critical, ambiguous, bitter portion to a distempered state. Times and occasions, and provocations, will teach their own lessons. The wife will determine from the gravity of the case; the irritable from sensibility to oppression; the high-minded from disdain and

and indignation at abusive power in unworthy hands; the brave and bold from the love of honourable danger in a generous cause: but, with or without right, a revolution will be the very last resource of the thinking and the good.

The third head of right, afferted by the pulpit of the Old Jewry, namely, the "right to form a " government for ourselves," has, at least, as little countenance from any thing done at the Revolution, either in precedent or principle, as the two first of their claims. The Revolution was made to preferve our antient indifputable laws and liberties, and that antient conflitution of government which is our only fecurity for law and liberty. If you are defirous of knowing the spirit of our constitution, and the policy which predominated in that great period which has fecured it to this hour, pray look for both in our histories, in our records, in our acts of parliament, and journals of parliament, and not in the fermons of the Old Jewry, and the after-dinner toafts of the Revolution Society .- In the former you will find other ideas and another language. Such a claim is as ill-fuited to our temper and wifhes as it is unsupported by any appearance of authority. The very idea of the fabrication of a new government, is enough to fill us with difgust and horror. We wished at the period of the Revolution, and do now wish, to derive all we possess as an inheritance from our forefathers.

forefathers. Upon that body and stock of inheritance we have taken care not to inoculate any cyon alien to the nature of the original plant. All the reformations we have hitherto made, have proceeded upon the principle of reference to antiquity; and I hope, nay I am persuaded, that all those which possibly may be made hereafter, will be carefully formed upon analogical precedent, authority, and example.

Our oldest reformation is that of Magna Charta. You will fee that Sir Edward Coke, that great oracle of our law, and indeed all the great men who follow him, to Blackstone*, are induftrious to prove the pedigree of our liberties. They endeavour to prove, that the antient charter, the Magna Charta of King John, was connected with another positive charter from Henry I. and that both the one and the other were nothing more than a re-affirmance of the still more antient standing law of the kingdom. In the matter of fact, for the greater part, these authors appear to be in the right; perhaps not always: but if the lawyers mistake in some particulars, it proves my position still the more strongly; because it demonstrates the powerful prepoffession towards antiquity, with which the minds of all our lawyers and legislators, and of all the people whom they wish to influence, have been always filled; and the stationary policy of this kingdom in confidering their most facred rights and franchises as an inheritance.

^{*} See Blackstone's Magna Charta, printed at Oxford, 1759.

In the famous law of the 3d of Charles I. called the Petition of Right, the parliament fays to the king, "Your subjects have inherited this " freedom," claiming their franchifes not on abstract principles "as the rights of men," but as the rights of Englishmen, and as a patrimony derived from their forefathers. Selden, and the other profoundly learned men, who drew this petition of right, were as well acquainted, at least, with all the general theories concerning the " rights of men," as any of the discourfers in our pulpits, or on your tribune; full as well as Dr. Price, or as the Abbé Seyes. But, for reafons worthy of that practical wifdom which fuperfeded their theoretic science, they preferred this positive, recorded, bereditary title to all which can be dear to the man and the citizen, to that vague speculative right, which exposed their fure inheritance to be fcrambled for and torn to pieces by every wild litigious spirit.

The same policy pervades all the laws which have since been made for the preservation of our liberties. In the 1st of William and Mary, in the samous statute, called the Declaration of Right, the two houses utter not a syllable of "a "right to frame a government for themselves." You will see, that their whole care was to secure the religion, laws, and liberties, that had been long possessed, and had been lately endangered. "Taking "into their most serious consideration "the best means for making such an establishment,

"that their religion, laws, and liberties, might "not be in danger of being again subverted," they auspicate all their proceedings, by stating as some of those best means, "in the first place" to do "as their ancestors in like cases have usually "done for vindicating their antient rights and "liberties, to declare;"—and then they pray the king and queen, "that it may be declared and "enacted, that all and singular the rights and "liberties asserted and declared are the true an"tient and indubitable rights and liberties of the " people of this kingdom."

You will observe, that from Magna Charta to the Declaration of Right, it has been the uniform policy of our constitution to claim and affert our liberties, as an entailed inheritance derived to us from our forefathers, and to be transmitted to our posterity; as an estate specially belonging to the people of this kingdom without any reference whatever to any other more general or prior right. By this means our constitution preferves an unity in so great a diversity of its parts. We have an inheritable crown; an inheritable peerage; and an house of commons and a people inheriting privileges, franchises, and liberties, from a long line of ancestors.

This policy appears to me to be the refult of profound reflection; or rather the happy effect of following nature, which is wisdom without reflection, and above it. A spirit of innovation is generally the result of a selfish temper and confined views. People will not look forward to posterity, who never look backward to their ancestors. Befides, the people of England well know, that the idea of inheritance furnishes a fure principle of conservation, and a sure principle of transmission; without at all excluding a principle of improvement. It leaves acquisition free; but it secures what it acquires. Whatever advantages are obtained by a state proceeding on these maxims, are locked fast as in a fort of family fettlement; grasped as in a kind of mortmain for ever. By a constitutional policy, working after the pattern of nature, we receive, we hold, we transmit our government and our privileges, in the same manner in which we enjoy and transmit our property and our lives. The inflitutions of policy, the goods of fortune, the gifts of Providence, are handed down, to us and from us, in the fame course and order. Our political fystem is placed in a just correspondence and fymmetry with the order of the world, and with the mode of existence decreed to a permanent body composed of transitory parts; wherein, by the disposition of a stupendous wifdom, moulding together the great mysterious incorporation of the human race, the whole, at one time, is never old, or middle-aged, or young, but in a condition of unchangeable constancy, moves on through the varied tenour of perpetual decay, fall, renovation, and progression. Thus, by preferving the method of nature in the conduct of the state, in what we improve we are never wholly new; in what we retain we are never never wholly obsolete. By adhering in this manner and on those principles to our forefathers, we are guided not by the superstition of antiquarians, but by the spirit of philosophic analogy, in this choice of inheritance we have given to our frame of polity the image of a relation in blood; binding up the constitution of our country with our dearest domestic ties; adopting our fundamental laws into the bosom of our family affections; keeping inseparable, and cherishing with the warmth of all their combined and mutually reslected charities, our state, our hearths, our se-pulchres, and our altars.

Through the same plan of a conformity to nature in our artificial inftitutions, and by calling in the aid of her unerring and powerful instincts, to fortify the fallible and feeble contrivances of our reason, we have derived several other, and those no small benefits, from considering our liberties in the light of an inheritance. Always acting as if in the prefence of canonized forefathers, the spirit of freedom, leading in itself to misrule and excess, is tempered with an awful gravity. This idea of a liberal descent inspires us with a fense of habitual native dignity, which prevents that upftart infolence almost inevitably adhering to and difgracing those who are the first acquirers of any distinction. By this means our liberty becomes a noble freedom. It carries an imposing and majestic aspect. It has a pedigree and illustrating ancestors. It has its bearings and its enfigns armorial. It has its gallery E lery of portraits; its monumental inscriptions; its records, evidences, and titles. We procure reverence to our civil institutions on the principle upon which nature teaches us to revere individual men; on account of their age; and on account of those from whom they are descended. All your sophisters cannot produce any thing better adapted to preserve a rational and manly freedom than the course that we have pursued, who have chosen our nature rather than our speculations, our breasts rather than our inventions, for the great conservatories and magazines of our rights and privileges.

You might, if you pleased, have profited of our example, and have given to your recovered freedom a correspondent dignity. Your privileges, though discontinued, were not lost to memory. Your constitution, it is true, whilst you were out of poffession, suffered waste and dilapidation; but you possessed in some parts the walls, and in all the foundations of a noble and venerable castle. You might have repaired those walls; you might have built on those old foundations. Your conflictution was suspended before it was perfected; but you had the elements of a conftitution very nearly as good as could be wished. In your old states you possessed that variety of parts corresponding with the various descriptions of which your community was happily composed; you had all that combination, and all that oppofition of interests, you had that action and counteraction which, in the natural and in the polirical tical world, from the reciprocal struggle of difcordant powers, draws out the harmony of the universe. These opposed and conflicting interests, which you considered as so great a blemish in your old and in our present constitution, interpose a falutary check to all precipitate resolutions; They render deliberation a matter not of choice, but of necessity; they make all change a fubject of compromise, which naturally begets moderation; they produce temperaments, preventing the fore evil of harsh, crude, unqualified reformations; and rendering all the headlong exertions of arbitrary power, in the few or in the many, for ever impracticable. Through that diversity of members and interests, general liberty had as many fecurities as there were feparate views in the feveral orders; whilst by preffing down the whole by the weight of a real monarchy, the feparate parts would have been prevented from warping and starting from their allotted places.

You had all these advantages in your antient states; but you chose to act as if you had never been moulded into civil society, and had every thing to begin anew. You began ill, because you began by despissing every thing that belonged to you. You set up your trade without a capital. If the last generations of your country appeared without much lustre in your eyes, you might have passed them by, and derived your claims from a more early race of ancestors. Under a pious predilection to those ancestors, your ima-

ginations would have realized in them a standard of virtue and wifdom, beyond the vulgar practice of the hour: and you would have rifen with the example to whose imitation you aspired. Respecting your forefathers, you would have been taught to respect yourselves. You would not have chofen to confider the French as a people of yesterday, as a nation of low-born fervile wretches until the emancipating year of 1789. In order to furnish, at the expence of your honour, an excuse to your apologists here for several enormities of yours, you would not have been content to be represented as a gang of Maroon flaves, fuddenly broke loofe from the house of bondage, and therefore to be pardoned for your abuse of the liberty to which you were not accustomed and ill fitted. Would it not, my worthy friend, have been wifer to have you thought, what I, for one, always thought you, a generous and gallant nation, long misled to your disadvantage by your high and romantic fentiments of fidelity, honour, and loyalty: that events had been unfavourable to you, but that you were not enflaved through any illiberal or fervile disposition; that in your most devoted submission, you were actuated by a principle of public spirit, and that it was your country you worshipped, in the person of your king? Had you made it to be understood, that in the delufion of this amiable error you had gone further than your wife ancestors; that you were refolved to refume your ancient privileges, whilft you preferved the spirit of your ancient and your recent recent loyalty and honour; or, if difficient of yourselves, and not clearly discerning the almost obliterated constitution of your ancestors, you had looked to your neighbours in this land, who had kept alive the ancient principles and models of the old common law of Europe meliorated and adapted to its present state-by following wife examples you would have given new examples of wisdom to the world. You would have rendered the cause of liberty venerable in the eyes of every worthy mind in every nation. You would have shamed despotism from the earth, by shewing that freedom was not only reconcileable, but as, when well disciplined it is, auxiliary to law. You would have had an unoppressive but a productive revenue. You would have had a flourishing commerce to feed it. You would have had a free constitution; a potent monarchy; a disciplined army; a reformed and venerated clergy; a mitigated but spirited nobility, to lead your virtue, not to overlay it; you would have had a liberal order of commons, to emulate and to recruit that nobility; you would have had a protected, fatisfied, laborious, and obedient people, taught to feek and to recognize the happiness that is to be found by virtue in all conditions; in which confifts the true moral equality of mankind, and not in that monstrous fiction, which, by inspiring false ideas and vain expectations into men destined to travel in the obscure walk of laborious life, serves only to aggravate and imbitter that real inequality, which E 3 which it never can remove; and which the order of civil life establishes as much for the beness of those whom it must leave in an humble state, as those whom it is able to exalt to a condition more splendid, but not more happy. You had a smooth and easy career of selicity and glory laid open to you, beyond any thing recorded in the history of the world; but you have shewn that difficulty is good for man.

Compute your gains: fee what is got by those extravagant and prefumptuous speculations which have taught your leaders to despise all their predeceffors, and all their contemporaries, and even to despise themselves, until the moment in which they became truly despicable. By following those false lights, France has bought undifguifed calamities at a higher price than any nation has purchased the most unequivocal blesfings! France has bought poverty by crime! France has not facrificed her virtue to her interest; but she has abandoned her interest, that she might prostitute her virtue. All other nations have begun the fabric of a new government, or the reformation of an old, by establishing originally, or by enforcing with greater exactness fome rites or other of religion. All other people have laid the foundations of civil freedom in feverer manners, and a fystem of a more austere and masculine morality. France, when she let loose the reins of regal authority, doubled the licence, of a ferocious dissoluteness in manners, and of an infolent irreligion in opinions and prac-

life, as if the were communicating fome privilege, or laying open fome fecluded benefit, all the unhappy corruptions that usually were the disease of wealth and power. This is one of the new principles of equality in France.

France, by the perfidy of her leaders, has utterly difgraced the tone of lenient council in the cabinets of princes, and difarmed it of its most potent topics. She has fanctified the dark suspicious maxims of tyrannous diffrust; and taught kings to tremble at (what will hereafter be called) the delusive plausibilities, of moral politicians. Sovereigns will consider those who advise them to place an unlimited confidence in their people, as Subverters of their thrones; as traitors who aim at their destruction, by leading their easy good-nature, under specious pretences, to admit combinations of bold and faithless men into a participation of their power. This alone (if there were nothing else) is an irreparable calamity to you and to mankind. Remember that your parliament of Paris told your king, that in calling the states together, he had nothing to fear but the prodigal excess of their zeal in providing for the support of the throne. It is right that these men should hide their heads. It is right that they should bear their part in the ruin which their counsel has brought on their fovereign and their country. Such fanguine declarations tend to full authority afleep; to encourage it rashly to engage in perilcus adventures of untried policy; E 4 to neglect those provisions, preparations, and precautions, which distinguish benevolence from imbecility; and without which no man can answer for the salutary effect of any abstract plan of government or of freedom. For want of these, they have seen the medicine of the state corrupted into its poison. They have seen the French rebel against a mild and lawful monarch, with more fury, outrage, and insult, than ever any people has been known to rise against the most illegal usurper, or the most sanguinary tyrant. Their resistance was made to concession; their revolt was from protection; their blow was aimed at an hand holding out graces, favours, and immunities.

This was unnatural. The rest is in order. They have found their punishment in their fuccess. Laws overturned; tribunals subverted: industry without vigour; commerce expiring; the revenue unpaid, yet the people impoverished; a church pillaged, and a state not relieved; civil and military anarchy made the constitution of the kingdom; every thing human and divine facrificed to the idol of public credit, and national bankruptcy the confequence; and to crown all, the paper fecurities of new, precarious, tottering power, the difcredited paper fecurities of impoverished fraud, and beggared rapine, held out as a currency for the support of an empire, in lieu of the two great recognized species that represent the lasting conventional credit of mankind, which disappeared and hid themselves in the earth from whence they came, when the principle of property, whose creatures and representatives they are, was systematically subverted.

Were all these dreadful things necessary? were they the inevitable refults of the desperate struggle of determined patriots, compelled to wade through blood and tumult, to the quiet shore of a tranquil and prosperous liberty? No! nothing like it. The fresh ruins of France, which shock our feelings wherever we can turn our eyes, are not the devastation of civil war: they are the fad but instructive monuments of rash and ignorant counsel in time of profound peace. They are the display of inconsiderate and presumptuous, because unresisted and irresistible authority. The persons who have thus squandered away the precious treasure of their crimes, the persons who have made this prodigal and wild wafte of public evils (the last stake referved for the ultimate ranfom of the state) have met in their progress with little, or rather with no oppofition at all. Their whole march was more like a triumphal procession than the progress of a war. Their pioneers have gone before them, and demolished and laid every thing level at their feet. Not one drop of their blood have they shed in the cause of the country they have ruined. They have made no facrifices to their projects of greater consequence than their shoebuckles, whilft they were imprisoning their king, murdering murdering their fellow citizens, and bathing in tears, and plunging in poverty and distress, thou-fands of worthy men and worthy families. Their cruelty has not even been the base result of fear. It has been the effect of their sense of perfect safety, in authorizing treasons, robberies, rapes, assassinations, slaughters, and burnings throughout their harrassed land. But the cause of all was plain from the beginning.

This unforced choice, this fond election of evil, would appear perfectly unaccountable, if we did not consider the composition of the National Assembly; I do not mean its formal constitution, which, as it now flands, is exceptionable enough, but the materials of which in a great measure it is composed, which is of ten thousand times greater consequence than all the formalities in the world. If we were to know nothing of this Affembly but by its title and function, no colours could paint to the imagination any thing more venerable. In that light the mind of an enquirer, subdued by fuch an awful image as that of the virtue and wisdom of a whole people collected into a focus, would paufe and hesitate in condemning things even of the very worst aspect. Instead of blameable, they would appear only mysterious. But no name, no power, no function, no artificial institution whatsoever, can make the men of whom any fystem of authority is composed, any other than God, and nature, and education, and their habits of life have made them. Capacities beyond beyond these the people have not to give. Virtue and wisdom may be the objects of their choice; but their choice confers neither the one nor the other on those upon whom they lay their ordaining hands. They have not the engagement of nature, they have not the promise of revelation for any fuch powers.

After I had read over the lift of the persons and descriptions elected into the Tiers Etat, nothing which they afterwards did could appear aftonishing. Among them, indeed, I saw some of known rank; fome of shining talents; but of any practical experience in the state, not one man was to be found. The best were only men of theory. But whatever the distinguished few may have been, it is the fubstance and mass of the body which constitutes its character, and must finally determine its direction. In all bodies, those who will lead, must also, in a considerable degree, follow. They must conform their propositions to the tafte, talent, and disposition of those whom they wish to conduct: therefore, if an Assembly is viciously or feebly composed in a very great part of it, nothing but fuch a supreme degree of virtue as very rarely appears in the world, and for that reason cannot enter into calculation, will prevent the men of talents diffeminated through it from becoming only the expert instruments of absurd projects! If what is the more likely event, instead of that unusual degree of virtue, they should be actuated by finister ambition and a lust of meretricious glory, then the feeble part of the Affembly,

Assembly, to whom at first they conform, becomes in its turn the dupe and instrument of their designs. In this political traffick the leaders will be obliged to bow to the ignorance of their followers, and the followers to become subservient to the worst designs of their leaders.

To secure any degree of sobriety in the propositions made by the leaders in any public assembly, they ought to respect, in some degree perhaps to sear, those whom they conduct. To be led any otherwise than blindly, the followers must be qualified, if not for actors, at least for judges; they must also be judges of natural weight and authority. Nothing can secure a steady and moderate conduct in such assemblies, but that the body of them should be respectably composed, in point of condition in life, of permanent property, of education, and of such habits as enlarge and liberalize the understanding.

In the calling of the states general of France, the sirst thing which struck me, was a great departure from the antient course. I found the representation for the Third Estate composed of six hundred persons. They were equal in number to the representatives of both the other orders. If the orders were to act separately, the number would not, beyond the consideration of the expence, be of much moment. But when it became apparent that the three orders were to be melted down into one, the policy and necessary effect of this numerous representation became obvious. A very small desertion from either of the other two orders must throw the power of both into the hands of the third. In fact, the whole power of the state was soon resolved into that body. Its due composition became therefore of infinitely the greater importance.

Judge, Sir, of my furprize, when I found that a very great proportion of the Affembly (a majority, I believe, of the members who attended) was composed of practitioners in the law. It was composed not of distinguished magistrates, who had given pledges to their country of their science, prudence, and integrity; not of leading advocates, the glory of the bar; not of renowned professors in universities; -but for the far greater part, as it must in such a number, of the inferior, unlearned, mechanical, merely instrumental members of the profession. There were distinguished exceptions; but the general composition was of obscure provincial advocates, of stewards of petty local jurisdictions, country attornies, notaries, and the whole train of the ministers of municipal litigation, the fomentors and conductors of the petty war of village vexation. From the moment I read the lift I faw distinctly, and very nearly as it has happened, all that was to follow.

The degree of estimation in which any profession is held becomes the standard of the estimation in which the professors hold themselves. Whatever the personal merits of many individual lawyers might have been, and in many it was undoubtedly very confiderable, in that military kingdom, no part of the profession had been much regarded, except the highest of all, who often united to their professional offices great family splendour, and were invested with great power and authority. These certainly were highly respected, and even with no small degree of awe. The next rank was not much esteemed; the mechanical part was in a very low degree of repute.

dual

Whenever the supreme authority is invested in a body fo composed, it must evidently produce the confequences of fupreme authority. placed in the hands of men not taught habitually to respect themselves; who had no previous fortune in character at stake; who could not be expected to bear with moderation, or to conduct with discretion, a power which they shemfelves, more than any others, must be furprized to find in their hands. Who could flatter himself that these men, suddenly, and, as it were, by enchantment, fnatched from the humblest rank of subordination, would not be intoxicated with their unprepared greatness? Who could conceive, that men who are habitually meddling, daring, fubtle, active, of litigious dispositions and unquiet minds, would easily fall back into their old condition of obscure contention, and laborious, low, unprofitable chicane? Who could doubt but that, at any expence expence to the state, of which they understood nothing, they must pursue their private interests, which they understood but too well? It was not an event depending on chance or contingency. It was inevitable; it was necessary; it was planted in the nature of things. They must join (if their capacity did not permit them to lead) in any project which could procure to them a litigious constitution; which could lay open to them those innumerable lucrative jobs which follow in the train of all great convulfions and revolutions in the state, and particularly in all great and violent permutations of property. Was it to be expected that they would attend to the stability of property, whose existence had always depended upon whatever rendered property questionable, ambiguous, and insecure? Their objects would be enlarged with their elevation, but their disposition and habits, and mode of accomplishing their defigns, must remain the fame.

Well! but these men were to be tempered and restrained by other descriptions, of more sober minds, and more enlarged understandings. Were they then to be awed by the super-eminent authority and awful dignity of an handful of country clowns who have seats in that Assembly, some of whom are said not to be able to read and write? and by not a greater number of traders, who, though somewhat more instructed, and more conspicuous in the order of society, had never known any thing beyond their counting-house?

ing-house? No! both these descriptions were more formed to be overborne and swayed by the intrigues and artifices of lawyers, than to become their counterpoife. With fuch a dangerous difproportion, the whole must needs be governed by them. To the faculty of law was joined a pretty confiderable proportion of the faculty of medicine. This faculty had not, any more than that of the law, possessed in France its just estimation. Its professors therefore must have the qualities of men not habituated to fentiments of dignity. But supposing they had ranked as they ought to do, and as with us they do actually, the fides of fick beds are not the academies for forming statesmen and legislators. Then came the dealers in flocks and funds, who must be eager, at any expence, to change their ideal paper wealth for the more folid substance of land. To these were joined men of other descriptions, from whom as little knowledge of or attention to the interests of a great state was to be expected, and as little regard to the stability of any institution; men formed to be instruments. not controls. Such in general was the composition of the Tiers Etat in the National Affembly ; in which was fearcely to be perceived the flightest traces of what we call the natural landed interest of the country.

We know that the British house of commons, without shutting its doors to any merit in any class, is, by the sure operation of adequate causes, filled filled with every thing illustrious in rank, in defcent, in hereditary and in acquired opulence, in cultivated talents, in military, civil, naval, and politic diffinction, that the country can afford. But supposing, what hardly can be supposed as a case, that the house of commons should be composed in the same manner with the Tiers Etat in France, would this dominion of chicane be borne with patience, or even conceived without horror? God forbid I should infinuate any thing derogatory to that profession, which is another priesthood, administering the rites of facred justice. But whilst I revere men in the functions which belong to them, and would do, as much as one man can do, to prevent their exclusion from any, I cannot, to flatter them, give the lye to nature. They are good and ufeful in the composition; they must be mischievous if they preponderate so as virtually to become the whole. Their very excellence in their peculiar functions may be far from a qualification for others. It cannot escape observation, that when men are too much confined to professional and faculty habits, and, as it were, inveterate in the recurrent employment of that narrow circle, they are rather disabled than qualified for whatever depends on the knowledge of mankind, on experience in mixed affairs, on a comprehensive connected view of the various complicated external and internal interests which go to the formation of that multifarious thing called a flate,

After all, if the house of commons were to have an wholly professional and faculty composition, what is the power of the house of commons, circumscribed and shut in by the immoveable barriers of laws, utages, politive rules of doctrine and practice, counterpoized by the house of lords, and every moment of its existence at the discretion of the crown to continue, prorogue, or diffolve us? The power of the house of commons, direct or indirect, is indeed great; and long may it be able to preserve its greatness, and the spirit belonging to true greatness, at the full; and it will do fo, as long as it can keep the breakers of law in India from becoming the makers of law for England. The power, however, of the house of commons, when least diminished, is as a drop of water in the ocean, compared to that reliding in a fettled majority of your National Affembly, That Affembly, fince the destruction of the orders, has no fundamental law, no ftrict convention, no respected usage to restrain it. Instead of finding themselves obliged to conform to a fixed conflicution, they have a power to make a constitution which shall conform to their designs. Nothing in heaven or upon earth can ferve as a control on them. What ought to be the heads, the hearts, the difpositions, that are qualified, or that dare, not only to make laws under a fixed conflitution, but at one heat to strike out a totally new constitution for a great kingdom, and in every part of it, from the monarch on the throne to the vestry of a parish ? parish? But—" fools rush in where angels fear to "tread." In such a state of unbounded power, for undefined and undefinable purposes, the evil of a moral and almost physical inaptitude of the man to the function must be the greatest we can conceive to happen in the management of human affairs.

Having confidered the composition of the third estate as it stood in its original frame, I took a view of the representatives of the clergy. There too it appeared, that full as little regard was had to the general fecurity of property, or to the aptitude of the deputies for their public purpofes, in the principles of their election. That election was fo contrived as to fend a very large proportion of mere country curates to the great and arduous work of new-modelling a state; men who never had feen the state fo much as in a picture; men who knew nothing of the world beyond the bounds of an obscure village; who, immersed in hopeless poverty, could regard all property, whether fecular or ecclefiaftical, with no other eye than that of envy; among whom must be many, who, for the smallest hope of the meanest dividend in plunder, would readily join in any attempts upon a body of wealth, in which they could hardly look to have any share, except in a general scramble. Instead of balancing the power of the active chicaners in the other affembly, these curates must necessarily become the active coadjutors, or at best the passive instruments of those with whom they had been habitually guided in their petty village con-F 2 cerns terns. They too could hardly be the most conscientious of their kind, who, presuming upon their incompetent understanding, could intrigue for a trust which led them from their natural relation to their flocks, and their natural spheres of action, to undertake the regeneration of kingdoms. This preponderating weight being added to the force of the body of chicane in the Tiers Etat, compleated that momentum of ignorance, rashness, presumption, and lust of plunder, which nothing has been able to refift.

To observing men it must have appeared from the beginning, that the majority of the Third Estate, in conjunction with such a deputation from the clergy as I have described, whilst it purfued the destruction of the nobility, would inevitably become subservient to the worst defigns of individuals in that class. In the spoil and humiliation of their own order these individuals would possess a fure fund for the pay of their new followers. To fquander away the objects which made the happiness of their fellows, would be to them no facrifice at all. Turbulent, discontented men of quality, in proportion as they are puffed up with personal pride. and arrogance, generally despise their own order. One of the first symptoms they discover of a felfish and mischievous ambition, is a profligate difregard of a dignity which they partake with others. To be attached to the fubdivision, to love the little platoon we belong to infociety, is the first principle (the germ as it were) of public affections. It is the first link in the feries by which we proceed towards a love to our country and to mankind. The interests of that portion of focial arrangement is a trust in the hands of all those who compose it; and as none but bad men would justify it in abuse, none but traitors would barter it away for their own personal advantage.

There were, in the time of our civil troubles in England (I do not know whether you have any fuch in your Affembly in France) feveral perfons, like the then Earl of Holland, who by themfelves or their families had brought an odium on the throne, by the prodigal dispensation of its bounties towards them, who afterwards joined in the rebellions arising from the discontents of which they were themselves the cause; men who helped to fubvert that throne to which they owed, fome of them, their existence, others all that power which they employed to ruin their benefactor. If any bounds are fet to the rapacious demands of that fort of people, or that others are permitted to partake in the objects they would engross, revenge and envy foon fill up the craving void that is left in their avarice. Confounded by the complication of distempered passions, their reason is disturbed; their views become vast and perplexed; to others inexplicable; to themselves uncertain. They find, on all fides, bounds to their unprincipled ambition in any fixed order of things. But in the fog and haze of confusion all is enlarged, and appears without any limit. F 3

When

When men of rank facrifice all ideas of dignity to an ambition without a distinct object, and work with low instruments and for low ends, the whole composition becomes low and base, Does not fomething like this now appear in France? Does it not produce fomething ignoble and inglorious? a kind of meanness in all the prevalent policy? a tendency in all that is done to lower along with individuals all the dignity and importance of the state? Other revolutions have been conducted by persons, who whilst they attempted or effected changes in the commonwealth, fanctified their ambition by advancing the dignity of the people whose peace they troubled. They had long views, They aimed at the rule, not at the destruction of their country. They were men of great civil, and great military talents, and if the ter-ror, the ornament of their age. They were not like Jew brokers contending with each other who could best remedy with fraudulent circulation and depreciated paper the wretchedness and ruin brought on their country by their degenerate councils. The compliment made to one of the great bad men of the old ftamp (Cromwell) by his kiniman, a favourite poet of that time, shews what it was he proposed, and what indeed to a great degree he accomplished in the success of his ambition:

[&]quot; Still as you rife, the fiate, exalted too,

[&]quot; Finds no distemper whilst 'tis chang'd by you;

[&]quot; Chang'd like the world's great scene, when without noise

[&]quot; The rifing fun night's vulgar lights destroys."

These disturbers were not so much like men usurping power, as afferting their natural place in fociety. Their rifing was to illuminate and beautify the world. Their conquest over their competitors was by outshining them. The hand that, like a destroying angel, smote the country, communicated to it the force and energy under which it suffered. I do not say (God forbid) I do not fay, that the virtues of fuch men were to be taken as a balance to their crimes; but they were some corrective to their effects. Such was, as I faid, our Cromwell. Such were your whole race of Guises, Condés, and Colignis. Such the Richlieus, who in more quiet times acted in the fpirit of a civil war. Such, as better men, and in a less dubious cause, were your Henry the 4th and your Sully, though nursed in civil confusions, and not wholly without fome of their taint. It is a thing to be wondered at, to fee how very foon France, when she had a moment to respire, recovered and emerged from the longest and most dreadful civil war that ever was known in any nation. Why? Because, among all their massacres, they had not slain the mind in their country. A conscious dignity, a noble pride, a generous fense of glory and emulation, was not extinguished. On the contrary, it was kindled and inflamed. The organs also of the state, however shattered, existed. All the prizes of honour and virtue, all the rewards, all the diffinctions, remained. But your present confusion, like a palfy, has attacked the fountain of FA of life itself. Every person in your country, in a fituation to be actuated by a principle of honour, is difgraced and degraded, and can entertain no fensation of life, except in a mortified and humiliated indignation. But this generation will quickly pass away. The next generation of the nobility will refemble the artificers and clowns. and money - jobbers, usurers, and Jews, who will be always their fellows, fometimes their masters. Believe me, Sir, those who attempt to level, never equalize. In all focieties, confifting of various descriptions of citizens, some description must be uppermost. The levellers therefore only change and pervert the natural order of things; they load the edifice of fociety, by fetting up in the air what the folidity of the structure requires to be on the ground. The affociations of taylors and carpenters, of which the republic (of Paris, for instance) is composed, cannot be equal to the situation, into which, by the worst of usurpations, an usurpation on the prerogatives of nature, you atrempt to force them.

The chancellor of France at the opening of the states, said, in a tone of oratorial stourish, that all occupations were honourable. If he meant only, that no honest employment was disgraceful, he would not have gone beyond the truth. But in afferting, that any thing is honourable, we imply some distinction in its favour. The occupation of an hair-dresser, or of a working tallow-chandler, cannot be a matter of honour to any person—person—to say nothing of a number of other more servile employments. Such descriptions of men ought not to suffer oppression from the state; but the state suffers oppression, if such as they, either individually or collectively, are permitted to rule. In this you think you are combating prejudice, but you are at war with nature *.

I do not, my dear Sir, conceive you to be of that fophistical captions spirit, or of that uncandid dulness, as to require, for every general observation or sentiment, an explicit detail of the correctives and exceptions, which reason will presume to be included in all the general propositions which come from reasonable men. You do not imagine, that I wish to confine power, authority, and distinction to blood, and names, and titles. No, Sir. There is no qualification for govern-

Ecclefiasticus, chap. xxxviii. verse 24, 25. "The wis dom of a learned man cometh by opportunity of leisure:

[&]quot; and he that hath little business shall become wise."—" How can he get wisdom that holdeth the plough, and that glo-

[&]quot; rieth in the goad; that driveth oxen; and is occupied in

[&]quot; their labours; and whose talk is of bullocks?"

Ver. 27. "So every carpenter and work-master that labouret eth night and day." &c.

Ver. 33. " They shall not be fought for in public counsel, on or fit high in the congregation: They shall not fit on the

[&]quot;judges feat, nor understand the sentence of judgment: they cannot declare justice and judgment, and they shall not be found where parables are fpoken."

Ver. 34. "But they will maintain the state of the world." I do not determine whether this book be canonical, as the Gallican church (till lately) has considered it, or apocryphal, as here it is taken. I am sure it contains a great deal of tense, and truth.

ment, but virtue and wisdom, actual or presumptive. Wherever they are actually found, they have, in whatever state, condition, profession or trade, the passport of Heaven to human place and honour. Woe to the country which would madly and impiously reject the fervice of the talents and virtues, civil, military, or religious, that are given to grace and to ferve it; and would condemn to obscurity every thing formed to diffuse lustre and glory around a state. Woe to that country too, that passing into the oppofite extreme, confiders a low education, a mean contracted view of things, a fordid mercenary occupation, as a preferable title to command. Every thing ought to be open; but not indifferently to every man. No rotation; no appointment by lot; no mode of election operating in the spirit of fortition or rotation, can be generally good in a government conversant in extensive objects. Because they have no tendency, direct or indirect, to select the man with a view to the duty, or to accommodate the one to the other. I do not hefitate to fay, that the road to eminence and power, from obscure condition, ought not to be made too easy, nor a thing too much of courfe. If rare merit be the rarest of all rare things, it ought to pass through some fort of probation. The temple of honour ought to be feated on an eminence. If it be open through virtue, let it be remembered too, that virtue is never tried but by fome difficulty, and fome struggle.

Nothing is a due and adequate representation of a state, that does not represent its ability, as well as its property. But as ability is a vigorous and active principle, and as property is fluggish, inert, and timid, it never can be fafe from the invasions of ability, unless it be, out of all proportion, predominant in the representation, It must be represented too in great masses of accumulation, or it is not rightly protected. The characteristic effence of property, formed out of the combined principles of its acquisition and conservation, is to be unequal. The great masses therefore which excite envy, and tempt rapacity, must be put out of the possibility of danger. Then they form a natural rampart about the leffer properties in all their gradations. The fame quantity of property, which is by the natural course of things divided among many, has not the same operation. Its defensive power is weakened as it is diffused. In this diffusion each man's portion is less than what, in the eagerness of his defires, he may flatter himself to obtain by diffipating the accumulations of others. The plunder of the few would indeed give but a share inconceivably small in the distribution to the many. But the many are not capable of making this calculation; and those who lead them to rapine, never intend this distribution.

The power of perpetuating our property in our families is one of the most valuable and interesting circumstances belonging to it, and that which tends the most to the perpetuation of society itself. It makes our weakness subservient to our virtue; it grafts benevolence even upon avarice. The possessor of family wealth, and of the distinction which attends hereditary possession (as most concerned in it) are the natural fecurities for this transmission. With us, the house of peers is formed upon this principle. It is wholly composed of hereditary property and hereditary distinction; and made therefore the third of the legislature; and in the last event, the sole judge of all property in all its subdivisions. The house of commons too, though not necessarily, yet in fact, is always so composed in the far greater part. Let those large proprietors be what they will, and they have their chance of being amongst the best, they are at the very worst, the ballast in the veffel of the commonwealth. For though hereditary wealth, and the rank which goes with it. are too much idolized by creeping fycophants, and the blind abject admirers of power, they are too rashly slighted in shallow speculations of the petulant, assuming, short-sighted coxcombs of philosophy. Some decent regulated pre-eminence. fome preference (not exclusive appropriation) given to birth, is neither unnatural, nor unjust, nor impolitic.

It is faid, that twenty-four millions ought to prevail over two hundred thousand. True; if the constitution of a kingdom be a problem of arithmetic. This fort of discourse does well enough with the lamp-post for its second: to men who may reason calmly, it is ridiculous. The will of the many, and their interest, must very often differ; and great will be the difference when they make an evil choice. A government of five hundred country attornies and obscure curates is not good for twenty-four millions of men, though it were chosen by eight and forty millions; nor is it the better for being guided by a dozen of persons of quality, who have betrayed their trust in order to obtain that power. At prefent, you feem in every thing to have strayed out of the high road of nature. The property of France does not govern it. Of course property is destroyed, and rational liberty has no existence. All you have got for the prefent is a paper circulation, and a flockjobbing constitution: and as to the future, do you feriously think that the territory of France, upon the republican system of eighty-three independent municipalities (to fay nothing of the parts that compose them) can ever be governed. as one body, or can ever be fet in motion by the impulse of one mind? When the National Affembly has completed its work, it will have accomplished its ruin. These commonwealths will not long bear a state of subjection to the republic of Paris. They will not bear that this one body should monopolize the captivity of the king, and the dominion over the affembly calling itself National. Each will keep its own portion of the spoil of the church to itself; and it will not suffer either that spoil, or the more just fruits of their industry, or the natural produce of their foil, to be fent to fwell the infolence, or pamper the luxury of the mechanics of Paris. In this they will fee none of the equality, under the pretence of which they have been tempted to throw off their allegiance giance to their fovereign, as well as the antient constitution of their country. There can be no capital city in fuch a constitution as they have lately made. They have forgot, that when they framed democratic governments, they had virtually difmembered their country. The person whom they perfevere in calling king, has not power left to him by the hundredth part fufficient to hold together this collection of republics. The republic of Paris will endeavour indeed to compleat the debauchery of the army, and illegally to perpetuale the affembly, without refort to its constituents, as the means of continuing its defpotism. It will make efforts, by becoming the heart of a boundless paper circulation, to draw every thing to itself; but in vain. All this policy in the end will appear as feeble as it is now violent.

If this be your actual fituation, compared to the fituation to which you were called, as it were by the voice of God and man, I cannot find it in my heart to congratulate you on the choice you have made, or the fuccess which has attended your endeavours. I can as little recommend to any other nation a conduct grounded on fuch principles, and productive of fuch effects. That I must leave to those who can see further into your affairs than I am able to do, and who best know how far your actions are favourable to their defigns. The gentlemen of the Revolution Society, who were so early in their congratulations, appear to be ftrongly of opinion that there is some scheme of politics relative to this country country, in which your proceedings may, in some way, be useful. For your Dr. Price, who seems to have speculated himself into no small degree of servour upon this subject, addresses his auditory in the following very remarkable words: "I cannot conclude without rew calling particularly to your recollection a consideration which I have more than once alwided to, and which probably your thoughts have been all along anticipating; a consideration with which my mind is impressed more than I can express. I mean the consideration of the favourableness of the present times to all exertions in the cause of liberty."

It is plain that the mind of this political Preacher was at the time big with some extraordinary design; and it is very probable, that the thoughts of his audience, who understood him better than I do, did all along run before him in his resection, and in the whole train of consequences to which it led.

Before I read that fermon, I really thought I had lived in a free country; and it was an error I cherished, because it gave me a greater liking to the country I lived in. I was indeed aware, that a jealous, ever-waking vigilance, to guard the treasure of our liberty, not only from invasion, but from decay and corruption, was our best wisdom and our first duty. However, I considered that treasure rather as a possession to be secured than as a prize to be contended for. I did not discern how the present time came to be so very favourable to all exertions in the cause of freedom. The present fent time differs from any other only by the circumstance of what is doing in France. If the example of that nation is to have an influence on this, I can eafily conceive why some of their proceedings which have an unpleasant aspect, and are not quite reconcileable to humanity, generofity, good faith, and justice, are palliated with fo much milky good-nature towards the actors, and borne with fo much heroic fortitude towards the fufferers. It is certainly not prudent to difcredit the authority of an example we mean to follow. But allowing this, we are led to a very natural question; - What is that cause of liberty, and what are those exertions in its favour, to which the example of France is fo fingularly auspicious? Is our monarchy to be annihilated, with all the laws, all the tribunals, and all the antient corporations of the kingdom? Is every land-mark of the country to be done away in favour of a geometrical and arithmetical constitution? Is the house of lords to be voted useless? Is episcopacy to be abolished? Are the church lands to be fold to Jews and jobbers; or given to bribe new-invented municipal republics into a participation in facrilege? Are all the taxes to be voted grievances, and the revenue reduced to a patriotic contribution, or patriotic prefents? Are filver shoebuckles to be fubflituted in the place of the land tax and the malt tax, for the support of the naval strength of this kingdom? Are all orders, ranks, and distinctions to be confounded, that out of univerfal anarchy, joined to national bankruptcy, three or four thousand democracies should be formed into eighty-three, and that they may all, by fome fort of unknown attractive power, be organized into one? For this great end, is the army to be feduced from its discipline and its fidelity, first, by every kind of debauchery, and then by the terrible precedent of a donative in the encrease of pay? Are the curates to be seduced from their bishops, by holding out to them the delufive hope of a dole out of the spoils of their own order? Are the citizens of London to be drawn from their allegiance, by feeding them at the expence of their fellow-fubjects? Is a compulsory paper currency to be substituted in the place of the legal coin of this kingdom? Is what remains of the plundered flock of public revenue to be employed in the wild project of maintaining two armies to watch over and to fight with each other?-If these are the ends and means of the Revolution Society, I admit they are well afforted: and France may furnish them for both with precedents in point.

I fee that your example is held out to shame us. I know that we are supposed a dull sluggish race, rendered passive by finding our situation tolerable; and prevented by a mediocrity of freedom from ever attaining to its sull perfection. Your leaders in France began by affecting to admire, almost to adore, the British constitution; but as they advanced they came to look upon it with a sovereign contempt. The friends of your National Assembly amongst us have full as mean an opinion of what was formerly thought the glory of their country. The Revolution Society has difcovered that the English nation is not free. They are convinced that the inequality in our representation is a "defect in our constitution fo gross and palpable, as to make it excellent chiefly in " form and theory "." That a representation in the legislature of a kingdom is not only the basis of all constitutional liberty in it, but of " all legi-" timate government; that without it a government is nothing but an usurpation;"-that " when " the representation is partial, the kingdom pos-" feffes liberty only partially; and if extremely co partial it gives only a semblance; and if not et only extremely partial, but corruptly chofen. " it becomes a nuisance." Dr. Price considers this inadequacy of representation as our fundamental grievance; and though, as to the corruption of this femblance of reprefentation, he hopes it is not yet arrived to its full perfection of depravity; he fears that " nothing will be done " towards gaining for us this effential bleffing, " until fome great abuse of power again provokes " our resentment, or some great calamity again " alarms our fears, or perhaps till the acquifition co of a pure and equal representation by other coun-" tries, whilst we are mocked with the shadow, "kindles our hame." To this he fubjoins a note in these words. "A representation, chosen " chiefly by the Treafury, and a few thousands of the dregs of the people, who are generally equal paid for their votes."

^{*} Discourse on the Love of our Country, 3d edit. p. 39.

You will fmile here at the confiftency of those democratifts, who, when they are not on their guard, treat the humbler part of the community with the greatest contempt, whilst, at the same time, they pretend to make them the depositories of all power. It would require a long discourse to point out to you the many fallacies that lurk in the generality and equivocal nature of the terms " inadequate representation." I shall only say here, in justice to that old-fashioned constitution, under which we have long prospered, that our representation has been found perfectly adequate to all the purposes for which a representation of the people can be defired or devised. I defy the enemies of our conftitution to shew the contrary. To detail the particulars in which it is found fo well to promote its ends, would demand a treatife on our practical conftitution. I frate here the doctrine of the Revolutionists, only that you and others may fee, what an opinion thefe gentlemen entertain of the constitution of their country, and why they feem to think that fome great abuse of power, or some great calamity, as giving a chance for the bleffing of a constitution according to their ideas, would be much palliated to their feelings; you fee why they are fo much enamoured of your fair and equal representation, which being once obtained, the fame effects might follow. You fee they confider our house of commons as only "a femblance," "a form," " a theory," " a fhadow," " a mockery," perhaps " a nuisance."

These gentlemen value themselves on being G 2 systematic;

fystematic; and not without reason. They must therefore look on this gross and palpable defect of representation, this fundamental grievance (so they call it) as a thing not only vicious in itfelf, but as rendering our whole government abfolutely illegitimate, and not at all better than a downright usurpation. Another revolution, to get rid of this illegitimate and usurped government, would of course be perfectly justifiable, if not absolutely necessary. Indeed their principle, if you observe it with any attention, goes much further than to an alteration in the election of the house of commons; for, if popular representation, or choice, is necessary to the legitimacy of all government, the house of lords is, at one stroke, bastardized and corrupted in blood. That house is no representative of the people at all, even in " femblance or in form." The case of the crown is altogether as bad. In vain the crown may endeavour to fcreen itfelf against these gentlemen by the authority of the establishment made on the Revolution. The Revolution which is reforted to for a title, on their fystem, wants a title itself. The Revolution is built, according to their theory, upon a basis not more folid than our present formalities, as it was made by an house of lords not reprefenting any one but themselves; and by an house of commons exactly fuch as the present, that is, as they term it, by a mere " shadow and mockery" of representation.

Something they must destroy, or they seem to themselves to exist for no purpose. One set is for destroying the civil power through the ecclesiastical: fialtical; another for demolishing the ecclesiastick through the civil. They are aware that the worst consequences might happen to the public in accomplishing this double ruin of church and state; but they are so heated with their theories, that they give more than hints, that this ruin, with all the mischies that must lead to it and attend it, and which to themselves appear quite certain, would not be unacceptable to them, or very remote from their wifhes. A man amongst them of great authority, and certainly of great talents, fpeaking of a fupposed alliance between church and state, says, "perhaps we must wait for the " fall of the civil powers before this most un-" natural alliance be broken. Calamitous no " doubt will that time be. But what convul-" fion in the political world ought to be a fub-" ject of lamentation, if it be attended with fo " desirable an effect?" You see with what a fleady eye these gentlemen are prepared to view the greatest calamities which can befall their country!

It is no wonder therefore, that with these ideas of every thing in their constitution and government at home, either in church or state, as illegitimate and usurped, or, at best as a vain mockery, they look abroad with an eager and passionate enthusiasm. Whilst they are possessed by these notions, it is vain to talk to them of the practice of their ancestors, the sundamental laws of their country, the fixed form of a constitution, whose merits are confirmed by the solid test of long experience, and an increasing public strength and national prosperity. They despise experience as the wisdom of unlettered men; and as for the rest, they have wrought under-ground a mine that will blow up at one grand explosion all examples of antiquity, all precedents, charters, and acts of parliament, They have "the rights of men." Against these there can be no prescription; against these no agreement is binding: these admit no temperament, and no compromife: any thing withheld from their full demand is fo much of fraud and injustice. Against these their rights of men let no government look for fecurity in the length of its continuance, or in the justice and lenity of its administration. The objections of these speculatifts, if its forms do not quadrate with their theories, are as valid against such an old and beneficent government as against the most violent tyranny, or the greenest usurpation. They are always at iffue with governments, not on a question of abuse, but a question of competency, and a question of title. I have nothing to fay to the clumfy fubtilty of their political metaphysics. Let them be their amusement in the schools. - " Illa se jattet in aula - Bolus, et " clauso ventorum carcere regnet." - But let them not break prison to burst like a Levanter, to fweep the earth with their hurricane, and to break up the fountains of the great deep to overwhelm us.

Far am I from denying in theory; full as far is my heart from withholding in practice (if I were of power to give or to withhold) the real rights of men. In denying their false claims of right, I do not mean to injure those which are real, and are fuch as their pretended rights would totally deftroy. If civil fociety be made for the advantage of man, all the advantages for which it is made become his right. It is an institution of beneficence; and law itself is only beneficence acting by a rule. Men have a right to live by that rule; they have a right to justice; as between their fellows, whether their fellows are in politic function or in ordinary occupation. They have a right to the fruits of their industry; and to the means of making their industry fruitful. They have a right to the acquifitions of their parents; to the nourishment and improvement of their offspring: to instruction in life, and to consolation in death. Whatever each man can feparately do, without trespassing upon others, he has a right to do for himself; and he has a right to a fair portion of all which fociety, with all its combinations of skill and force, can do in his favour. In this partnership all men have equal rights; but not to equal things. He that has but five shillings in the partnership, has as good a right to it, as he that has five hundred has to his larger proportion. But he has not a right to an equal dividend in the product of the joint estate; and as to the share of power, authority, and direction which each individual ought to have in the management of the state, that I must deny to be amongst the direct original rights of man in civil fociety; for I have in my contemplation the civil focial man, and no other. It is a thing to be fettled by convention.

If civil fociety be the offspring of convention, that convention must be its law. That convention

G 4 must

must limit and modify all the descriptions of conflitution which are formed under it. Every fort of legislative, judicial, or executory power are its creatures. They can have no being in any other flate of things; and how can any man claim, under the conventions of civil fociety, rights which do not fo much as fuppose its existence? Rights which are absolutely repugnant to it? One of the first motives to civil fociety, and which becomes one of its fundamental rules, is, that no man should be judge in his own cause. By this each person has at once divested himself of the first fundamental right of uncovenanted man, that is, to judge for himself, and to affert his own cause. He abdicates all right to be his own governor. He inclusively, in a great measure, abandons the right of felf-defence, the first law of nature. Men cannot enjoy the rights of an uncivil and of a civil state together. That he may obtain justice he gives up his right of determining what it is in points the most effential to him. That he may fecure fome liberty, he makes a furrender in truft of the whole of it.

Government is not made in virtue of natural rights, which may and do exist in total independence of it; and exist in much greater clearness, and in a much greater degree of abstract perfection: but their abstract perfection is their practical defect. By having a right to every thing they want every thing. Government is a contrivance of human wisdom to provide for human wants. Men have a right that these wants should be provided for by this wisdom. Among these wants is to be reckoned the want, out of civil fociety, of a fufficient restraint upon their passions. Society requires not only that the passions of individuals should be fubjected, but that even in the mass and body as well as in the individuals, the inclinations of men should frequently be thwarted, their will controlled, and their passions brought into subjection. This can only be done by a power out of themselves; and not, in the exercise of its function, subject to that will and to those passions which it is its office to bridle and fubdue. In this fense the restraints on men, as well as their liberties, are to be reckoned among their rights. But as the liberties and the reftrictions vary with times and circumstances, and admit of infinite modifications, they cannot be fettled upon any abstract rule; and nothing is so foolish as to discuss them upon that principle.

The moment you abate any thing from the full rights of men, each to govern himfelf, and fuffer any artificial positive limitation upon those rights, from that moment the whole organization of government becomes a confideration of convenience. This it is which makes the constitution of a state, and the due distribution of its powers, a matter of the most delicate and complicated skill. It requires a deep knowledge of human nature and human necessities, and of the things which facilitate or obstruct the various ends which are to be purfued by the mechanism of civil institutions. The state is to have re-cruits to its strength, and remedies to its distempers. What is the use of discussing a man's abstract right to food or to medicine? The The question is upon the method of procuring and administering them. In that deliberation I shall always advise to call in the aid of the farmer and the physician, rather than the professor of metaphysics.

The science of constructing a commonwealth, or renovating it, or reforming it, is, like every other experimental science, not to be taught à priori. Nor is it a short experience that can instruct us in that practical science; because the real effects of moral causes are not always immediate; but that which in the first instance is prejudicial may be excellent in its remoter operation; and its excellence may arise even from the ill effects it produces in the beginning. The reverse also happens; and very plausible fchemes, with very pleasing commencements, have often shameful and lamentable conclusions. In flates there are often some obscure and almost latent causes, things which appear at first view of little moment, on which a very great part of its prosperity or adversity may most essentially depend. The science of government being therefore fo practical in itself, and intended for such practical purposes, a matter which requires experience, and even more experience than any perfon can gain in his whole life, however fagacious and observing he may be, it is with infinite caution that any man ought to venture upon pulling down an edifice which has answered in any tolerable degree for ages the common purpofes of fociety, or of building it up again, without having models and patterns of approved utility before his eyes. Thefe

These metaphysic rights entering into common life, like rays of light which pierce into a dense medium, are, by the laws of nature, refracted from their straight line. Indeed in the gross and complicated mass of human passions and concerns, the primitive rights of men undergo fuch a variety of refractions and reflections, that it becomes abfurd to talk of them as if they continued in the fimplicity of their original direction-The nature of man is intricate; the objects of fociety are of the greatest possible complexity; and therefore no fimple disposition or direction of power can be fuitable either to man's nature, or to the quality of his affairs. When I hear the simplicity of contrivance aimed at and boafted of in any new political constitutions, I am at no loss to decide that the artificers are grossly ignorant of their trade, or totally negligent of their dury. The fimple governments are fundamentally defective, to fay no worse of them. If you were to contemplate fociety in but one point of view, all these simple modes of polity are infinitely captivating. In effect each would answer its single end much more perfectly than the more complex is able to attain all its complex purpofes. But it is better that the whole should be imperfectly and anomalously answered, than that, while fome parts are provided for with great exactness, others might be totally neglected, or perhaps materially injured, by the over-care of a favourite member.

The pretended rights of these theorists are all extremes; and in proportion as they are metaphysically physically true, they are morally and politically false. The rights of men are in a fort of middle, incapable of definition, but not impossible to be discerned. The rights of men in governments are their advantages; and these are often in balances between differences of good; in compromises sometimes between good and evil, and sometimes, between evil and evil. Political reason is a computing principle; adding, subtracting, multiplying, and dividing, morally and not metaphysically or mathematically, true moral denominations.

By these theorists the right of the people is almost always fophistically confounded with their power. The body of the community, whenever it can come to act, can meet with no effectual refistance; but till power and right are the fame, the whole body of them has no right inconfistent with virtue, and the first of all virtues, prudence. Men have no right to what is not reasonable, and to what is not for their benefit; for though a pleasant writer said, Liceat perire poetis, when one of them, in cold blood, is faid to have leaped into the flames of a volcanic revolution, Ardentem frigidus Ætnam infiluit, I confider fuch a frolic rather as an unjustifiable poetic licence, than as one of the franchifes of Parnaffus; and whether he were poet or divine, or politician that chose to exercise this kind of right, I think that more wife, because more charitable thoughts would urge me rather to fave the man, than to preferve his brazen flippers as the monuments of his folly. The

The kind of anniversary fermons, to which a great part of what I write refers, if men are not shamed out of their present course, in commemorating the fact, will cheat many out of the principles, and deprive them of the benefits of the Revolution they commemorate. I confess to you, Sir, I never liked this continual talk of relistance and revolution, or the practice of making the extreme medicine of the constitution its daily bread. It renders the habit of fociety dangeroufly valetudinary: it is taking periodical dofes of mercury fublimate, and fwallowing down repeated provocatives of cantharides to our love of liberty.

This diftemper of remedy, grown habitual, relaxes and wears out, by a vulgar and proftituted use, the spring of that spirit which is to be exerted on great occasions. It was in the most patient period of Roman fervitude that themes of tyrannicide made the ordinary exercise of boys at school—cum perimit savos classis numerosa tyrannos. In the ordinary state of things, it produces in a country like ours the worst effects, even on the cause of that liberty which it abuses with the diffoluteness of an extravagant speculation. Almost all the high-bred republicans of my time have, after a short space, become the most decided, thorough-paced courtiers; they foon left the business of a tedious, moderate, but practical refistance to those of us whom, in the pride and intoxication of their theories, they have flighted, as not much better than tories. Hypocrify, of courfe, delights in the most

most sublime speculations; for, never intending to go beyond speculation, it costs nothing to have it magnificent. But even in cases where rather levity than fraud was to be suspected in these ranting speculations, the issue has been much the fame. These professors, finding their extreme principles not applicable to cases which call only for a qualified, or, as I may fay, civil and legal refistance, in fuch cases employ no refiftance at all. It is with them a war or a revolution, or it is nothing. Finding their schemes of politics not adapted to the state of the world in which they live, they often come to think lightly of all public principle; and are ready, on their part, to abandon for a very trivial interest what they find of very trivial value. Some indeed are of more fleady and persevering natures; but these are eager politicians out of parliament, who have little to tempt them to abandon their favourite projects. They have some change in the church or flate, or both, conflantly in their view. When that is the case, they are always bad citizens, and perfectly unfure connexions. For, confidering their speculative defigns as of infinite value, and the actual arrangement of the state as of no estimation, they are at best indifferent about it. They see no merit in the good, and no fault in the vicious management of public affairs; they rather rejoice in the latter, as more propitious to revolution. They fee no merit or demerit in any man, or any action, or any political principle, any further than as they may forward or retard their defign of of change: they therefore take up, one day, the most violent and stretched prerogative, and another time the wildest democratic ideas of freedom, and pass from the one to the other without any sort of

regard to cause, to person, or to party.

In France you are now in the crifis of a revolution, and in the transit from one form of government to another-you cannot fee that character of men exactly in the fame fituation in which we fee it in this country. With us it is militant; with you it is triumphant; and you know how it can act when its power is commensurate to its will. I would not be supposed to confine those observations to any description of men, or to comprehend all men of any description within them-No! far from it. I am as incapable of that injuffice, as I am of keeping terms with those who profess principles of extremes; and who under the name of religion teach little elfe than wild and dangerous politics. The worst of these polities of revolution is this; they temper and harden the breaft, in order to prepare it for the desperate strokes which are sometimes used in extreme occasions. But as these occasions may never arrive, the mind receives a gratuitous taint; and the moral fentiments fuffer not a little, when no political purpose is served by the depravation. This fort of people are fo taken up with their theories about the rights of man, that they have totally forgot his nature. Without opening one new avenue to the understanding, they have succeeded in stopping up those that lead to the heart. They have perverted verted in themselves, and in those that attend to them, all the well-placed sympathies of the human breast.

This famous fermon of the Old Jewry breathes nothing but this fpirit through all the political part. Plots, maffacres, affaffinations, feem to fome people a trivial price for obtaining a revolution. A cheap, bloodless reformation, a guiltless liberty, appear flat and vapid to their tafte. There must be a great change of scene; there must be a magnificent stage effect; there must be a grand spectacle to rouze the imagination, grown torpid with the lazy enjoyment of fixty years fecurity, and the still unanimating repose of public prosperity. The Preacher found them all in the French revolution. This inspires a juvenile warmth through his whole frame. His enthusiasm kindles as he advances; and when he arrives at his peroration, it is in a full blaze. Then viewing, from the Pifgah of his pulpit, the free, moral, happy, flourishing, and glorious state of France, as in a bird-eye landscape of a promifed land, he breaks out into the following rapture; and one dollar as

"What an eventful period is this! I am "thankful that I have lived to it; I could al"most say, Lord, now lettest thou thy servant de"part in peace, for mine eyes have seen thy salva"tion.—I have lived to see a diffusion of know"ledge, which has undermined superstition and

" error.—I have lived to fee the rights of men better understood than ever; and nations pant-

" ing for liberty which feemed to have loft the " idea of it,- I have lived to fee Thirty Millions of People, indignant and resolute, spurning at states of states, and demanding liberty with an irrestification. Their King led in triumph, and an arbitrary monarch surrendering himself to his

is subjects *."

Before I proceed further, I have to remark, that Dr. Price feems rather to over-value the great acquisitions of light which he has obtained and diffused in this age. The last century appears to me to have been quite as much enlightened. It had, though in a different place, a triumph as memorable as that of Dr. Price; and some of the great preachers of that period partook of it as eagerly as he has done in the triumph of France. On the trial of the Reva Hugh Peters for high treason, it was deposed, that when King Charles was brought to London for his trial, the Apostle of Liberty in that day conducted the triumph. " I faw," fays the witness, " his majesty in the coach with fix " horses, and Peters riding before the king " triumphing." Dr. Price, when he talks as if he had made a discovery, only follows a precedent; for, after the commencement of the king's trial, this precurfor, the fame Dr. Peters, concluding a long prayer at the royal chapel at Whitehall,

(he

Another of these reverend gentlemen, who was witness to some of the spectacles which Paris has lately exhibited—expresses himself thus, "A king dragged in submissione triumph by his conquering subjects is one of those appearances of grandeur which seldom rise in the prospect of human affers, and which, during the remainder of my life, I shall think of with wonder and gratification." These gentlemen agree marvellously in their feelings.

(he had very triumphantly chosen his place) faid, " I have prayed and preached these twenty years; " and now I may fay with old Simeon, Lord, now ec lettest thou thy servant depart in peace, for mine eves have seen thy salvation *." Peters had not the fruits of his prayer; for he neither departed fo foon as he wished, nor in peace. He became (what I heartily hope none of his followers may be in this country) himself a facrifice to the triumph which he led as Pontiff. They dealt at the Restoration, perhaps, too hardly with this poor good man. But we owe it to his memory and his fufferings, that he had as much illumination, and as much zeal, and had as effectually undermined all the superstition and error which might impede the great business he was engaged in, as any who follow and repeat after him, in this age, which would affume to itself an exclusive title to the knowledge of the rights of men, and all the glorious confequences of that knowledge.

After this fally of the preacher of the Old Jewry, which differs only in place and time, but agrees perfectly with the spirit and letter of the rapture of 1648, the Revolution Society, the fabricators of governments, the heroic band of cashierers of monarchs, electors of sovereigns, and leaders of kings in triumph, strutting with a proud consciousness of the diffusion of knowledge, of which every member had obtained so large a share in the donative, were in haste to make a generous diffusion of the know-

make this bountiful communication, they adjourned from the church in the Old Jewry, to the London Tavern; where the same Dr. Price, in whom the sumes of his oracular tripod were not entirely evaporated, moved and carried the resolution, or address of congratulation, transmitted by Lord Stanhope to the National Assembly of France.

I find a preacher of the gospel prophaning the beautiful and prophetic ejaculation; commonly called " nunc dimittis," made on the first prefentation of our Saviour in the Temple, and applying it, with an inhuman and unnatural rapture, to the most horrid, atrocious, and afflicting spectacle, that perhaps ever was exhibited to the pity and indignation of mankind. This " leading in triumph," a thing in its best form unmanly and irreligious, which fills our Preacher with fuch unhallowed transports, must shock, I believe, the moral taste of every well-born mind. Several English were the stupisied and indignant spectators of that triumph. It was (unless we have been strangely deceived) a spectacle more resembling a procesfion of American favages, entering into Onondaga, after fome of their murders called victories, and leading into hovels hung round with scalps, their captives, overpowered with the fcoffs and buffets of women as ferocious as themselves, much more than it resembled the triumphal pomp of a civilized martial nation; - if a civilized nation, or any men who had a fense of generofity, were capable of a personal triumph over the fallen and affliched.

This,

This, my dear Sir, was not the triumph of France. I must believe that, as a nation, it overwhelmed you with shame and horror. I must believe that the National Assembly find themselves in a state of the greatest humiliation, in not being able to punish the authors of this triumph, or the actors in it; and that they are in a situation in which any enquiry they may make upon the subject, must be destitute even of the appearance of liberty or impartiality. The apology of that Assembly is found in their situation; but when we approve what they must bear, it is in us the degenerate choice of a vitiated mind.

With a compelled appearance of deliberation, they vote under the dominion of a stern necessity. They fit in the heart, as it were, of a foreign republic: they have their residence in a city whose conftitution has emanated neither from the charter of their king, nor from their legislative power. There they are furrounded by an army not raifed either by the authority of their crown, or by their command; and which, if they should order to diffolve itself, would instantly dissolve them. There they fit, after a gang of affaffins had driven away all the men of moderate minds and moderating authority amongst them, and left them as a fort of dregs and refuse, under the apparent lead of those in whom they do not fo much as pretend to have any confidence. There they fit, in mockery of legislation, repeating in resolutions the words of those whom they detest and despise. Captives themselves, they compel a captive king to issue as royal edicts, at third hand, the polluted nonfense fense of their most licentious and giddy coffeehouses. It is notorious, that all their measures are decided before they are debated. It is beyond doubt, that under the terror of the bayonet, and the lamp-post, and the torch to their houses, they are obliged to adopt all the crude and desperate measures suggested by clubs composed of a monstrous medley of all conditions, tongues, and nations. Among these are found persons, in comparison of whom Catiline would be thought scrupulous, and Cethegus a man of fobriety and moderation. Nor is it in these clubs alone that the publick measures are deformed into monsters. They undergo a previous diffortion in academies, intended as fo many feminaries for these clubs, which are fet up in all the places of publick refort. In these meetings of all forts, every counsel, in proportion as it is daring, and violent, and perfidious, is taken for the mark of superior genius. Humanity and compassion are ridiculed as the fruits of fuperstition and ignorance. Tenderness to individuals is confidered as treason to the public. Liberty is always to be estimated perfect as property is rendered infecure. Amidst affassination, masfacre, and confiscation, perpetrated or meditated, they are forming plans for the good order of future fociety. Embracing in their arms the carcafes of base criminals, and promoting their relations on the title of their offences, they drive hundreds of virtuous persons to the same end, by forcing them to fublift by beggary or by crime.

The Affembly, their organ, acts before them the farce of deliberation with as little decency as liberty. They act like the comedians of a fair before a riotous audience; they act amidst the tumultuous cries of a mixed mob of ferocious men, and of women loft to shame, who, according to their infolent fancies, direct, control, applaud, explode them; and fometimes mix and take their feats amongst them; domineering over them with a strange mixture of servile petulance and proud prefumptuous authority. As they have inverted order in all things, the gallery is in the place of the house. This Affembly, which overthrows kings and kingdoms, has not even the physiognomy and aspect of a grave legislative body-nec color imperii, nec frons erat ulla senatus. They have a power given to them, like that of the evil principle, to fubvert and deftroy; but none to construct, except fuch machines as may be fitted for further fubverfion and further destruction.

Who is it that admires, and from the heart is attached to national representative affemblies, but must turn with horror and disgust from such a profane burlesque, and abominable perversion of that sacred institute? Lovers of monarchy, lovers of republicks, must alike abhor it. The members of your Assembly must themselves groan under the tyranny of which they have all the shame, none of the direction, and little of the profit. I am sure many of the members who compose even the majority of that body, must feel as I do, notwithstanding the applauses of the Revolution Society.

—Miserable

-Miserable king! miserable Assembly! How must that assembly be silently scandalized with those of their members, who would call a day which feemed to blot the fun out of Heaven, "un beau jour *!" How must they be inwardly indignant at hearing others, who thought fit to declare to them, " that the veffel of the state would fly forward in her course towards regeneration with more " fpeed than ever," from the stiff gale of treason and murder, which preceded our Preacher's triumph! What must they have felt, whilst with outward patience and inward indignation they heard of the flaughter of innocent gentlemen in their houses, that "the blood spilled was not the " most pure?" What must they have felt, when they were belieged by complaints of diforders which shook their country to its foundations, at being compelled coolly to tell the complainants, that they were under the protection of the law. and that they would address the king (the captive king) to cause the laws to be enforced for their protection; when the enflaved ministers of that captive king had formally notified to them, that there were neither law, nor authority, nor power left to protect? What must they have felt at being obliged, as a felicitation on the present new year, to request their captive king to forget the stormy period of the last, on account of the great good which be was likely to produce to his people; to the complete attainment of which good they adjourned the practical demonstrations of their loyalty, affuring him of their obedience, when he should no longer possess any authority to command?

This address was made with much good-nature and affection, to be fure. But among the revolurions in France, must be reckoned a considerable revolution in their ideas of politeness. In England we are faid to learn manners at fecond-hand from your fide of the water, and that we drefs our behaviour in the frippery of France, If fo, we are still in the old cut; and have not fo far conformed to the new Parifian mode of goodbreeding, as to think it quite in the most refined strain of delicate compliment (whether in condolence or congratulation) to fay, to the most humiliated creature that crawls upon the earth, that great public benefits are derived from the murder of his fervants, the attempted affaffination of himfelf and of his wife, and the mortification, difgrace, and degradation, that he has perfonally fuffered. It is a topic of confolation which our ordinary of Newgate would be too humane to use to a criminal at the foot of the gallows. I should have thought that the hangman of Paris, now that he is liberalized by the vote of the National Affembly, and is allowed his rank and arms in the Herald's College of the rights of men, would be too generous, too gallant a man, too full of the fense of his new dignity, to employ that cutting confolation to any of the persons whom the leze nation might bring under the administration of his executive powers.

A man is fallen indeed, when he is thus flattered. drugged, is well calculated to preserve a galling wakefulness, and to feed the living ulcer of a corroding memory. Thus to administer the opiate potion of amnesty, powdered with all the ingredients of scorn and contempt, is to hold to his lips, instead of "the balm of hurt minds," the cup of human misery full to the brim, and to force him to drink it to the dregs.

Yielding to reasons, at least as forcible as those which were fo delicately urged in the compliment on the new year, the king of France will probably endeavour to forget these events, and that compliment. But history, who keeps a durable record of all our acts, and exercises her awful censure over the proceedings of all forts of fovereigns, will not forget, either those events, or the æra of this liberal refinement in the intercourse of mankind. History will record, that on the morning of the 6th of October 1789, the king and queen of France, after a day of confusion, alarm, dismay, and flaughter, lay down, under the pledged fecurity of public faith, to indulge nature in a few hours of respite, and troubled melancholy repose. From this sleep the queen was first startled by the voice of the centinel at her door, who cried out to her, to fave herfelf by flightthat this was the last proof of fidelity he could give-that they were upon him, and he was dead. Instantly he was cut down. A band of cruel ruffians and affaffins, reeking with his blood, rushed into the chamber of the queen, and pierced with

with an hundred strokes of bayonets and poniards the bed, from whence this perfecuted woman had but just time to sly almost naked, and through ways unknown to the murderers had escaped to seek refuge at the feet of a king and husband, not secure of his own life for a moment.

This king, to fay no more of him, and this queen, and their infant children (who once would have been the pride and hope of a great and generous people) were then forced to abandon the fanctuary of the most splendid palace in the world, which they left fwimming in blood, polluted by massacre, and strewed with scattered limbs and mutilated carcafes. Thence they were conducted into the capital of their kingdom. Two had been felected from the unprovoked, unrefifted, promiscuous slaughter, which was made of the gentlemen of birth and family who composed the king's body guard. These two gentlemen, with all the parade of an execution of justice, were cruelly and publickly dragged to the block, and beheaded in the great court of the palace. Their heads were fluck upon fpears, and led the procession; whilst the royal captives who followed in the train were flowly moved along, amidst the horrid yells, and shrilling fcreams, and frantic dances, and infamous contumelies, and all the unutterable abominations of the furies of hell, in the abused shape of the vilest of women. After they had been made to tafte, drop by drop, more than the bitterness of death, in the flow torture of a journey of twelve miles, miles, protracted to fix hours, they were, under a guard, composed of those very soldiers who had thus conducted them through this famous triumph, lodged in one of the old palaces of Paris, now converted into a Bastile for kings.

Is this a triumph to be confecrated at altars? to be commemorated with grateful thankfgiving? to be offered to the divine humanity with fervent prayer and enthusiaftick ejaculation ?- These Theban and Thracian Orgies, acted in France, and applauded only in the Old Jewry, I affure you, kindle prophetic enthusiasm in the minds but of very few people in this kingdom; although a faint and apostle, who may have revelations of his own, and who has fo completely vanquished all the mean fuperstitions of the heart, may incline to think it pious and decorous to compare it with the entrance into the world of the Prince of Peace, proclaimed in an holy temple by a venerable fage, and not long before not worse announced by the voice of angels to the quiet innocence of shepherds.

At first I was at a loss to account for this fit of unguarded transport. I knew, indeed, that the sufferings of monarchs make a delicious repast to some fort of palates. There were reflexions which might serve to keep this appetite within some bounds of temperance. But when I took one circumstance into my consideration, I was obliged to confess, that much allowance ought to be made for the Society, and that the temptation was too strong for common discretion; I mean, the circumstance of the Io Pæan of the triumph, the animating cry which called " for all the BISHOPS to be hanged on " the lamp-posts*," might well have brought forth a burst of enthusiasm on the foreseen confequences of this happy day, I allow to fo much enthufiasm some little deviation from prudence. I allow this prophet to break forth into hymns of joy and thankfgiving on an event which appears like the precurfor of the Millenium, and the projected fifth monarchy, in the destruction of all church establishments. There was, however (as in all human affairs there is) in the midst of this joy fomething to exercise the patience of these worthy gentlemen, and to try the long-fuffering of their faith. The actual murder of the king and queen, and their child, was wanting to the other auspicious circumstances of this " beautiful day." The actual murder of the bishops, though called for by fo many holy ejaculations, was also wanting. A groupe of regicide and facrilegious flaughter, was indeed boldly sketched, but it was only sketched. It unhappily was left unfinished, in this great history-piece of the masfacre of innocents. What hardy pencil of a great mafter, from the school of the rights of men, will finish it, is to be seen hereaster. The age has not yet the compleat benefit of that diffusion of knowledge that has undermined superstition and error; and the king of France wants another object or two, to confign to oblivion, in confideration of all the good which is to arife from his own fufferings, and the patriotic crimes of an enlightened age *.

* It is proper here to refer to a letter written upon this subject by an eye-witness. That eye-witness was one of the most honest, intelligent, and eloquent members of the National Assembly, one of the most active and zealous reformers of the state. He was obliged to secede from the assembly; and he afterwards became a voluntary exile, on account of the horrors of this pious triumph, and the dispositions of men, who, prositing of crimes, if not causing them, have taken the lead in public affairs.

qui avoient voulu faire de sa tete un trophée de plus.

"Voila ce qui me fit jurer de ne plus mettre le pied dans cette caverne d' Antropophages [the National Assembly] où je n'avois plus de force d'élever la voix, ou depuis six semaines je l'avois elevée en vain. Moi, Mounier, et tous les honnêtes gens, ont le dernier effort à faire pour le bien étoit d'en fortir. Aucune idée de crainte ne s'est approchée de moi. Je rougir is de m'en defendre. J'avois encore reçû fur la route de la part de ce peuple, moins coupable que ceux qui l'ont enivré de fureur, des acclamations, et des applaudissements, dont d'autres auroient, été flattés, et qui m'ont fait fremir. This military man had not so good nerves as the peaceable gentleman of the Old Jewry.—See Mons. Mounier's narrative of these transactions; a man also of honour and virtue, and talents, and therefore a fugitive.

who are made for accomplishing Revolutions. But I cannot stop here. Influenced by the inborn feelings of my nature, and not being illuminated by a single ray of this new-sprung modern light, I confess to you, Sir, that the exalted rank of the persons suffering, and particularly the sex, the beauty, and the amiable qualities of the descendant of so many kings and emperors, with the tender age of royal infants, insensible only through infancy and innocence of the cruel outrages to which their parents were exposed, instead of being a subject of exultation, adds not a little to my sensibility on that most melancholy occasion.

I hear that the august person, who was the principal object of our preacher's triumph, though he supported himself, felt much on that shameful occasion. As a man, it became him to seel for his wife and his children, and the faithful guards of his person, that were massacred in cold blood about him; as a prince, it became him to seel for the strange and frightful transformation of his civilized subjects, and to be more grieved for them, than solicitous for himself. It derogates little from his fortitude, while it adds infinitely to the honour of his humanity. I am very forry to say it, very forry indeed, that such personages are in a situation in which it is not unbecoming in us to praise the virtues of the great.

I hear, and I rejoice to hear, that the great lady, the other object of the triumph, has borne that day (one is interested that beings made for fuffering should suffer well) and that she bears all the fucceeding days, that she bears the imprisonment of her husband, and her own captizity, and the exile of her friends, and the insulting adulation of addresses, and the whole weight of her accumulated wrongs, with a serene patience, in a manner suited to her rank and race, and becoming the offspring of a sovereign distinguished for her piety and her courage; that like her she has lofty sentiments; that she feels with the dignity of a Roman matron; that in the last extremity she will save herself from the last disgrace, and that if she must fall, she will fall by no ignoble hand.

It is now fixteen or seventeen years since I faw the queen of France, then the dauphiness, at Verfailles; and furely never lighted on this orb, which she hardly feemed to touch, a more delightful vision. I faw her just above the horizon, decorating and cheering the elevated fphere she just began to move in, glittering like the morning-star, full of life, and splendor, and joy. Oh! what a revolution! and what an heart must I have, to contemplate without emotion that elevation and that fall! Little did I dream that, when she added titles of veneration to those of enthusiastic, distant, respectful love, that she should ever be obliged to carry the sharp antidote against difgrace concealed in that bofom; little did I dream that I should have lived to fee fuch difasters fallen upon her in a nation of gallant men, in a nation of men of honour and of cavaliers. I thought ten thousand swords must have leaped from their scabbards to avenge even even a look that threatened her with infult .- But the age of chivalry is gone. - That of fophisters. œconomists, and calculators, has succeeded; and the glory of Europe is extinguished for ever. Never, never more, shall we behold that generous loyalty to rank and fex, that proud fubmission, that dignified obedience, that subordination of the heart, which kept alive, even in servitude itself, the spirit of an exalted freedom. The unbought grace of life, the cheap defence of nations, the nurse of manly sentiment and heroic enterprize is gone! It is gone, that fenfibility of principle, that chaftity of honour, which felt a stain like a wound, which inspired courage whilst it mitigated ferocity, which ennobled whatever it touched, and under which vice itself lost half its evil, by lofing all its groffnefs.

This mixed fystem of opinion and sentiment had its origin in the antient chivalry; and the principle, though varied in its appearance by the varying state of human affairs, subsisted and influenced through a long fuccession of generations, even to the time we live in. If it should ever be totally extinguished, the loss I fear will be great. It is this which has given its character to modern Europe. It is this which has diffinguished it under all its forms of government, and distinguished it to its advantage, from the states of Afia, and possibly from those states which flourished in the most brilliant periods of the antique world. It was this, which, without confounding ranks, had produced a noble equality, and handed it down through all the gradations of of focial life. It was this opinion which mitigated kings into companions, and raifed private men to be fellows with kings. Without force, or opposition, it subdued the sierceness of pride and power; it obliged sovereigns to submit to the soft collar of social esteem, compelled stern authority to submit to elegance, and gave a domination vanquisher of laws, to be subdued by manners.

But now all is to be changed. All the pleafing illusions, which made power gentle, and obedience liberal, which harmonized the different shades of life, and which, by a bland affimilation, incorporated into politics the fentiments which beautify and foften private fociety, are to be diffolved by this new conquering empire of light and reason. All the decent drapery of life is to be rudely torn off. All the superadded ideas, furnished from the wardrobe of a moral imagination, which the heart owns, and the understanding ratifies, as necessary to cover the defects of our naked shivering nature, and to raise it to dignity in our own estimation, are to be exploded as a ridiculous, abfurd, and antiquated fashion.

On this scheme of things, a king is but a man; a queen is but a woman; a woman is but an animal; and an animal not of the highest order. All homage paid to the sex in general as such, and without distinct views, is to be regarded as romance and folly. Regicide, and parricide, and facrilege, are but sictions of superstition, corrupting jurisprudence by destroying ing its simplicity. The murder of a king, or a queen, or a bishop, or a father, are only common homicide; and if the people are by any chance, or in any way gainers by it, a fort of homicide much the most pardonable, and into which we ought not to make too severe a scrutiny.

On the scheme of this barbarous philosophy, which is the offspring of cold hearts and muddy understandings, and which is as void of folid wifdom, as it is destitute of all taste and elegance, laws are to be supported only by their own terrors, and by the concern, which each individual may find in them, from his own private speculations, or can spare to them from his own private interests. In the groves of their academy, at the end of every vifto, you fee nothing but the gallows. Nothing is left which engages the affections on the part of the commonwealth. On the principles of this mechanic philosophy, our inflitutions can never be embodied, if I may use the expression, in persons; so as to create in us love, veneration, admiration, or attachment. But that fort of reason which banishes the affections is incapable of filling their place. These public affections, combined with manners, are required fometimes as supplements, fometimes as correctives, always as aids to law. The precept given by a wife man, as well as a great critic, for the construction of poems, is equally true as to states. Non fatis est pulchra esse poemata, dulcia sunto. There ought to be a fystem of manners in every nation which a well-I 2 formed formed mind would be disposed to relish. To make us love our country, our country ought to be lovely.

But power, of some kind or other, will furvive the shock in which manners and opinions perish; and it will find other and worfe means for its fupport. The usurpation which, in order to subvert antient inftitutions, has destroyed antient principles, will hold power by arts fimilar to those by which it has acquired it. When the old feudal and chivalrous spirit of Fealty, which, by freeing kings from fear, freed both kings and fubjects from the precautions of tyranny, shall be extinct in the minds of men, plots and affaffinations will be anticipated by preventive murder and preventive confiscation, and that long roll of grim and bloody maxims, which form the political code of all power, not standing on its own honour, and the honour of those who are to obey it. Kings will be tyrants from policy when subjects are rebels from principle.

When antient opinions and rules of life are taken away, the loss cannot possibly be estimated. From that moment we have no compass to govern us; nor can we know distinctly to what port we steer. Europe undoubtedly, taken in a mass, was in a stourishing condition the day on which your Revolution was compleated. How much of that prosperous state was owing to the spirit of our old manners and opinions is not easy to say; but as such causes cannot be indifferent in their operation, we must presume, that, on the whole, their operation was beneficial.

We

We are but too apt to consider things in the state in which we find them, without sufficiently adverting to the causes by which they have been produced, and possibly may be upheld. Nothing is more certain, than that our manners, our civilization, and all the good things which are connected with manners, and with civilization, have, in this European world of ours, depended for ages upon two principles; and were indeed the refult of both combined; I mean the spirit of a gentleman, and the spirit of religion. The nobility and the clergy, the one by profeffion, the other by patronage, kept learning in existence, even in the midst of arms and confufions, and whilst governments were rather in their causes than formed. Learning paid back what it received to nobility and to priesthood; and paid it with usury, by enlarging their ideas, and by furnishing their minds. Happy if they had all continued to know their indiffoluble union. and their proper place! Happy if learning, not debauched by ambition, had been fatisfied to continue the inftructor, and not aspired to be the mafter! Along with its natural protectors and guardians, learning will be cast into the mire, and trodden down under the hoofs of a swinish multitude.

If, as I suspect, modern letters owe more than they are always willing to own to antient manners, so do other interests which we value sull as much as they are worth. Even commerce, and trade, and manufacture, the gods of our economical politicians, are themselves perhaps but I 3 creatures:

reflexion; our minds (as it has long since been observed) are purified by terror and pity; our weak unthinking pride is humbled, under the dispensations of a mysterious wisdom.—Some tears might be drawn from me, if such a spectacle were exhibited on the stage. I should be truly ashamed of finding in myself that superficial, theatric sense of painted distress, whilst I could exult over it in real life. With such a perverted mind, I could never venture to shew my face at a tragedy. People would think the tears that Garrick formerly, or that Siddons not long since, have extorted from me, were the tears of hypocrify; I should know them to be the tears of folly.

Indeed the theatre is a better school of moral fentiments than churches, where the feelings of humanity are thus outraged. Poets, who have to deal with an audience not yet graduated in the school of the rights of men, and who must apply themselves to the moral constitution of the heart, would not dare to produce fuch a triumph as a matter of exultation. There, where men follow their natural impulses, they would not bear the odious maxims of a Machiavelian policy, whether applied to the attainment of monarchical or democratic tyranny. They would reject them on the modern, as they once did on the antient stage, where they could not bear even the hypothetical proposition of such wickedness in the mouth of a personated tyrant, though suitable to the character he fustained. No theatric audience in Athens would bear what has been borne, borne, in the midst of the real tragedy of this triumphal day; a principal actor weighing, as it were in scales hung in a shop of horrors, - so much actual crime against so much contingent advantage,-and after putting in and out weights, declaring that the balance was on the fide of the advantages. They would not bear to fee the crimes of new democracy posted as in a ledger against the crimes of old despotisin, and the book-keepers of politics finding democracy still in debt, but by no means unable or unwilling to pay the balance. In the theatre, the first intuitive glance, without any elaborate process of reasoning, would shew, that this method of political computation, would justify every extent of crime. They would fee, that on these principles, even where the very worst acts were not perpetrated, it was owing rather to the fortune of the conspirators than to their parsimony in the expenditure of treachery and blood. They would foon fee, that criminal means once tolerated are foon preferred. They prefent a shorter cut to the object than through the highway of the moral virtues. Justifying perfidy and murder for public benefit, public benefit would foon become the pretext, and perfidy and murder the end; until rapacity, malice, revenge, and fear more dreadful than revenge, could fatiate their infatiable appetites. Such must be the confequences of losing in the splendour of these triumphs of the rights of men, all natural fense of wrong and right.

But the Reverend Pastor exults in this "lead"ing in triumph," because truly Louis XVIth was "an arbitrary monarch;" that is, in other words, neither more nor lefs, than because he was Louis the XVIth, and because he had the misfortune to be born king of France, with the prerogatives of which, a long line of ancestors, and a long acquiescence of the people, without any act of his, had put him in possession. A misfortune it has indeed turned out to him, that he was born king of France. But misfortune is not crime, nor is indifcretion always the greatest guilt. I shall never think that a prince, the acts of whose whole reign were a feries of concessions to his fubjects, who was willing to relax his authority, to remit his prerogatives, to call his people to a share of freedom, not known, perhaps not defired by their ancestors; such a prince, though he should be subject to the common frailties attached to men and to princes, though he should have once thought it necessary to provide force against the desperate designs manifestly carrying on against his person, and the remnants of his authority; though all this should be taken into confideration, I shall be led with great difficulty to think he deferves the cruel and insulting triumph of Paris, and of Dr. Price. I tremble for the cause of liberty, from such an example to kings. I tremble for the cause of humanity, in the unpunished outrages of the most wicked of mankind. But there are some people of that low and degenerate fashion of mind, that they look up with a fort of complacent awe and admiration to kings, who know to keep firm in their feat, to hold a strict hand over their subjects, to affert their prerogative, and by the awakened vigilance of a severe despotism, to guard against the very first approaches of freedom. Against such as these they never elevate their voice. Deserters from principle, listed with fortune, they never see any good in suffering virtue, nor any crime in prosperous usurpation.

If it could have been made clear to me, that the king and queen of France (those I mean who were fuch before the triumph) were inexorable and cruel tyrants, that they had formed a deliberate scheme for massacring the National Asfembly (I think I have feen fomething like the latter infinuated in certain publications) I should think their captivity just. If this be true, much more ought to have been done, but done, in my opinion, in another manner. The punishment of real tyrants is a noble and awful act of justice: and it has with truth been faid to be confolatory to the human mind. But if I were to punish a wicked king, I should regard the dignity in avenging the crime. Justice is grave and decorous, and in its punishments rather seems to submit to a necessity, than to make a choice. Had Nero. or Agrippina, or Louis the Eleventh, or Charles the Ninth, been the subject; if Charles the Twelfth of Sweden, after the murder of Patkul, or his predeceffor Christina, after the murder of Monaldeschi, had fallen into your hands, Sir, or into mine, I am fure our conduct would have been different.

If the French King, or King of the French, (or by whatever name he is known in the new vocabulary of your conftitution) has in his own person, and that of his Queen, really deserved these unavowed but unavenged murderous attempts, and those subsequent indignities more cruel than murder, fuch a person would ill deferve even that subordinate executory trust. which I understand is to be placed in him; nor is he fit to be called chief in a nation which he has outraged and oppressed. A worse choice for fuch an office in a new commonwealth, than that of a deposed tyrant, could not possibly be made. But to degrade and infult a man as the worst of criminals, and afterwards to trust him in your highest concerns, as a faithful, honest, and zealous fervant, is not confiftent in reasoning, nor prudent in policy, nor fafe in practice. Those who could make such an appointment must be guilty of a more flagrant breach of trust than any they have yet committed against the people. As this is the only crime in which your leading politicians could have acted inconfiftently. I conclude that there is no fort of ground for these horrid infinuations. I think no better of all the other calumnies.

In England, we give no credit to them. We are generous enemies: We are faithful allies. We fourn from us with disgust and indignation the slanders of those who bring us their anecdotes with the attestation of the flower-de-luce on their shoulder. We have Lord George Gordon fast in Newgate; and neither his being a public profelyte selyte to Judaism, nor his having, in his zeal against Catholick priests and all fort of ecclefiaftics, raifed a mob (excuse the term, it is still in use here) which pulled down all our prisons, have preserved to him a liberty, of which he did not render himself worthy by a virtuous use of it. We have rebuilt Newgate, and tenanted the mansion. We have prisons almost as strong as the Bastile, for those who dare to libel the queens of France. In this spiritual retreat, let the noble libeller remain. Let him there meditate on his Thalmud, until he learns a conduct more becoming his birth and parts, and not fo difgraceful to the antient religion to which he has become a profelyte; or until fome perfons from your fide of the water, to please your new Hebrew brethren, shall ransom him. He may then be enabled to purchase, with the old hoards of the fynagogue, and a very fmall poundage, on the long compound interest of the thirty pieces of filver (Dr. Price has shewn us what miracles compound interest will perform in 1790 years) the lands which are lately discovered to have been usurped by the Gallican church. Send us your popish Archbishop of Paris, and we will fend you our protestant Rabbin. We shall treat the person you fend us in exchange like a gentleman and an honest man, as he is; but pray let him bring with him the fund of his hospitality, bounty, and charity; and, depend upon it, we shall never confiscate a shilling of that honourable and pious fund, nor think of enriching the treasury with the spoils of the poor-box.

To tell you the truth, my dear Sir, I think the honour of our nation to be fomewhat concerned in the disclaimer of the proceedings of this society of the Old Jewry and the London Tavern. I have no man's proxy. I speak only from myself; when I disclaim, as I do with all possible earnestness, all communion with the actors in that triumph, or with the admirers of it. When I affert any thing elfe, as concerning the people of England, I speak from observation not from authority; but I speak from the experience I have had in a pretty extensive and mixed communication with the inhabitants of this kingdom, of all descriptions and ranks, and after a course of attentive observation, began early in life, and continued for near forty years. I have often been aftonished, confidering that we are divided from you but by a flender dyke of about twenty-four miles, and that the mutual intercourse between the two countries has lately been very great, to find how little you feem to know of us. I fuspect that this is owing to your forming a judgment of this nation from certain publications, which do, very erroneoully, if they do at all, represent the opinions and dispositions generally prevalent in England. The vanity, restlessness, petulance, and spirit of intrigue of feveral petty cabals, who attempt to hide their total want of consequence in bustle and noise, and puffing, and mutual quotation of each other, makes you imagine that our contemptuous neglect of their abilities is a mark of general acquiescence in their opinions. No fuch thing, I affure you. Because half a dozen grashoppers grashoppers under a fern make the field ring with their importunate chink, whilst thousands of great cattle, reposed beneath the shadow of the British oak, chew the cud and are silent, pray do not imagine, that those who make the noise are the only inhabitants of the field; that of course, they are many in number; or that, after all, they are other than the little shrivelled; meagre, hopping, though loud and troublesome insects of the hour.

I almost venture to affirm, that not one in a hundred amongst us participates in the " tri-" umph " of the Revolution Society. If the king and queen of France, and their children, were to fall into our hands by the chance of war, in the most acrimonious of all hostilities (I deprecate fuch an event, I deprecate fuch hoftility) they would be treated with another fort of triumphal entry into London. We formerly have had a king of France in that fituation; you have read how he was treated by the victor in the field; and in what manner he was afterwards received in England. Four hundred years have gone over us; but I believe we are not materially changed fince that period. Thanks to our fullen refistance to innovation, thanks to the cold fluggishness of our national character, we still bean the stamp of our forefathers. We have not (as I conceive) lost the generosity and dignity of thinking of the fourteenth century; nor as yet have we fubtilized ourselves into savages. We are not the converts of Rousseau; we are not the disciples of Voltaire; Helvetius has made no progress amongst us. Atheists are not our preachers;

preachers; madmen are not our lawgivers. We know that we have made no discoveries; and we think that no discoveries are to be made, in morality; nor many in the great principles of government, nor in the ideas of liberty, which were understood long before we were born, altogether as well as they will be after the grave has heaped its mould upon our prefumption, and the filent tomb shall have imposed its law on our pert loquacity. In England we have not yet been completely embowelled of our natural entrails; we still feel within us, and we cherish and cultivate, those inbred fentiments which are the faithful guardians, the active monitors of our duty, the true supporters of all liberal and manly morals. We have not been drawn and truffed, in order that we may be filled, like stuffed birds in a museum, with chaff and rags, and paltry, blurred fhreds of paper about the rights of man. We preserve the whole of our feelings ftill native and entire, unsophisticated by pedantry and infidelity. We have real hearts of flesh and blood beating in our bosoms. We fear God; we look up with awe to kings; with affection to parliaments; with duty to magiftrates; with reverence to priests; and with refpect to nobility *. Why? Because when such

The English are, I conceive, misrepresented in a Letter published in one of the papers, by a gentleman thought to be a dissenting minister.—When writing to Dr. Price, of the spirit which prevails at Paris, he says, "The spirit of the people in this place has abolished all the proud dissinctions which the king and nobles had usurped in their minds; "whether ideas are brought before our minds, it is natural to be so affected; because all other seelings are salfe and spurious, and tend to corrupt our minds, to vitiate our primary morals, to render us unsit for rational liberty; and by teaching us a service, licentious, and abandoned insolence, to be our low sport for a few holidays, to make us perfectly sit for, and justly deserving of slavery, through the whole course of our lives.

You fee, Sir, that in this enlightened age I am bold enough to confess, that we are generally men of untaught feelings; that instead of casting away all our old prejudices, we cherish them to a very confiderable degree, and, to take more shame to ourselves, we cherish them because they are prejudices; and the longer they have lasted, and the more generally they have prevailed, the more we cherish them. We are afraid to put men to live and trade each on his own private flock of reason; because we suspect that this stock in each man is small, and that the individuals would do better to avail themselves of the general bank and capital of nations, and of ages. Many of our men of speculation, instead of exploding general prejudices, employ their fagacity to discover the latent wisdom which prevails in them. If they find what they feek, and they feldom fail, they think it more wife to continue the prejudice.

whether they talk of "the king, the noble, or the prieft, their whole language is that of the most enlightened and liberal among ft the English." If this gentleman means to confine the terms enlightened and liberal to one set of men in England, it may be true. It is not generally so.

with the reason involved, than to cast away the coat of prejudice, and to leave nothing but the naked reason; because prejudice, with its reason, has a motive to give action to that reason, and an affection which will give it permanence. Prejudice is of ready application in the emergency; it previously engages the mind in a steady course of wisdom and virtue, and does not leave the man hesitating in the moment of decision, sceptical, puzzled, and unresolved. Prejudice renders a man's virtue his habit; and not a series of unconnected acts. Through just prejudice, his duty becomes a part of his nature.

Your literary men, and your politicians, and fo do the whole clan of the enlightened among us, effentially differ in these points. They have no respect for the wisdom of others; but they pay it off by a very full measure of confidence in their own. With them it is a fufficient motive to destroy an old scheme of things, because it is an old one. As to the new, they are in no fort of fear with regard to the duration of a building run up in hafte; because duration is no object to those who think little or nothing has been done before their time, and who place all their hopes in difcovery. They conceive, very lystematically, that all things which give perpetuity are mischievous, and therefore they are at inexpiable war with all establishments. They think that government may vary like modes of dreis, and with as little ill effect. That there needs no principle of attachment, except a fense of present conveniency, to any constitution of the state. They always speak as if they were of opinion that there is a singular species of compact between them and their magistrates, which binds the magistrate, but which has nothing reciprocal in it, but that the majesty of the people has a right to dissolve it without any reason, but its will. Their attachment to their country itself, is only so far as it agrees with some of their sleeting projects; it begins and ends with that scheme of polity which falls in with their momentary opinion.

These doctrines, or rather sentiments, seem prevalent with your new statesmen. But they are wholly different from those on which we have always acted in this country.

I hear it is fometimes given out in France, that what is doing among you is after the example of England. I beg leave to affirm, that scarcely any thing done with you has originated from the practice or the prevalent opinions of this people, either in the act or in the spirit of the proceeding. Let me add, that we are as unwilling to learn these lessons from France, as we are fure that we never taught them to that nation. The cabals here who take a fort of fhare in your transactions as yet confift but of an handful of people. If unfortunately by their intrigues, their fermons, their publications, and by a confidence derived from an expected union with the counfels and forces of the French nation, they should draw considerable numbers into their faction, and in confe-K 2 quence quence should seriously attempt any thing here in imitation of what has been done with you, the event, I dare venture to prophesy, will be, that, with some trouble to their country, they will soon accomplish their own destruction. This people refused to change their law in remote ages, from respect to the infallibility of popes; and they will not now alter it from a pious implicit faith in the dogmatism of philosophers; though the former was atmed with the anathema and crusade, and though the latter should act with the libel and the lampiron.

Formerly your affairs were your own concern only. We felt for them as men; but we kept aloof from them, because we were not citizens of France. But when we see the model held up to ourselves, we must feel as Englishmen, and seeling, we must provide as Englishmen. Your affairs, in spite of us, are made a part of our interest; so far at least as to keep at a distance your panacea, or your plague. If it be a panacea, we do not want it. We know the consequences of unnecessary physic. If it be a plague; it is such a plague, that the precautions of the most severe quarantine ought to be established against it.

I hear on all hands that a cabal, calling itself philosophic, receives the glory of many of the late proceedings; and that their opinions and systems are the true actuating spirit of the whole of them. I have heard of no party in England, literary or political, at any time, known by such a description. It is not with you composed of those men, is it? whom the vulgar, in their blunt, homely homely style, commonly call Atheists and Infidels? If it be, I admit that we too have had writers of that description, who made some noise in their day. At present they repose in lasting oblivion. Who, born within the last forty years, has read one word of Collins, and Toland, and Tindal, and Chubb, and Morgan, and that whole race who called themselves Freethinkers? Who now reads Bolingbroke? Who ever read him through? Ask the booksellers of London what is become of all these lights of the world. In as few years their few fuccessors will go to the family vault of " all the Capulets." But whatever they were, or are, with us, they were and are wholly unconnected individuals. With us they kept the common nature of their kind, and were not gregarious. They never acted in corps, nor were known as a faction in the state, nor prefumed to influence, in that name or character, or for the purposes of fuch a faction, on any of our public concerns. Whether they ought fo to exist, and so be permitted to act, is another question. As such cabals have not ex-isted in England, so neither has the spirit of them had any influence in establishing the original frame of our constitution, or in any one of the feveral reparations and improvements it has undergone. The whole has been done under the auspices, and is confirmed by the fanctions of religion and piety. The whole has emanated from the fimplicity of our national character, and from a fort of native plainness and directness of understanding, which for a long time charac-K 3 terized terized those men who have successively obtained authority amongst us. This disposition still remains, at least in the great body of the people.

We know, and what is better we feel inwardly, that religion is the basis of civil society, and the fource of all good and of all comfort*. In England we are so convinced of this, that there is no ruft of fuperfittion, with which the accumulated abfurdity of the human mind might have crusted it over in the course of ages, that ninety-nine in an hundred of the people of England would not prefer to impiety. We shall never be fuch fools as to call in an enemy to the fubstance of any system to remove its corruptions, to supply its defects, or to perfect its construction. If our religious tenets should ever want a further elucidation, we shall not call on atheism to explain them. We shall not light up our temple from that unhallowed fire. It will be illuminated with other lights. It will be perfumed with other incense, than the infectious stuff which is imported by the fmugglers of adulterated metaphyfics. If our ecclefiaftical establishment should want a revision, it is not avarice or rapacity, public or private, that we shall employ for the audit, or receipt, or application of its confecrated revenue.-Violently condemning neither ^{*} Sit igitur hoc ab initio persuasum civibus, dominos esse omnium rerum ac moderatores, deos; eaque, quæ gerantur, eorum geri vi, ditione, ac numine; eosdemque optime de genere hominum mereri; et qualis quisque sit, quid agat, quid in se admittat, qua mente, qua pietate colat religiones intueri; piorum et impiorum habere rationem. the Greek nor the Armenian, nor, fince heats are fublided, the Roman fystem of religion, we prefer the Protestant; not because we think it has less of the Christian religion in it, but because, in our judgment, it has more. We are protestants, not from indifference but from zeal.

We know, and it is our pride to know, that man is by his conflitution a religious animal; that atheism is against, not only our reason but our inflincts; and that it cannot prevail long. But if, in the moment of riot, and in a drunken delirium from the hot spirit drawn out of the alembick of hell, which in France is now so furiously boiling, we should uncover our nakedness by throwing off that Christian religion which has hitherto been our boast and comfort, and one great source of civilization amongst us, and among many other nations, we are apprehensive (being well aware that the mind will not endure a void) that some uncouth, pernicious, and degrading superstition, might take place of it.

For that reason, before we take from our establishment the natural human means of estimation, and give it up to contempt, as you have done, and in doing it have incurred the penalties you well deferve to suffer, we desire that some other may be presented to us in the place of it. We shall then form our judgment.

On these ideas, instead of quarrelling with establishments, as some do, who have made a philosophy and a religion of their hostility to such institutions, we cleave closely to them. We are resolved to keep an established church, an established monarchy, an established aristocracy, and an established democracy, each in the degree it exists, and in no greater. I shall shew you prefently how much of each of these we possess.

It has been the misfortune (not as these gentlemen think it, the glory) of this age, that every thing is to be discussed, as if the constitution of our country were to be always a subject rather of altercation than enjoyment. For this reason, as well as for the satisfaction of those among you (if any such you have among you) who may wish to profit of examples, I venture to trouble you with a few thoughts upon each of these establishments. I do not think they were unwise in antient Rome, who, when they wished to new-model their laws, sent commissioners to examine the best constituted republics within their reach.

First, I beg leave to speak of our church establishment, which is the first of our prejudices, not a prejudice destitute of reason, but involving in it profound and extensive wisdom. I speak of it fi.ft. It is first, and last, and midst in our minds. For, taking ground on that religious fystem, of which we are now in possession, we continue to act on the early received, and uniformly continued fense of mankind. That fense not only, like a wife architect, hath built up the august fabric of states, but like a provident proprietor, to preserve the structure from prophanation and ruin, as a facred temple, purged from all the impurities of fraud, and violence, and injuffice, and tyranny, hath folemnly and for ever confecrated the commonwealth, and all that officiate in it. This confecration is made, that all who administer in the government of men, in which they stand in the person of God himself, should have high and worthy notions of their function and destination; that their hope should be full of immortality; that they should not look to the paltry pelf of the moment, nor to the temporary and transient praise of the vulgar, but to a solid, permanent existence, in the permanent part of their nature, and to a permanent same and glory, in the example they leave as a rich inheritance to the world.

Such fublime principles ought to be infufed into perfons of exalted fituations; and religious establishments provided, that may continually revive and enforce them. Every fort of moral, every fort of civil, every fort of politic institution, aiding the rational and natural ties that connect the human understanding and affections to the divine, are not more than necessary, in order to build up that wonderful structure, Man; whose prerogative it is, to be in a great degree a creature of his own making; and who when made as he ought to be made, is destined to hold no trivial place in the creation. But whenever man is put over men, as the better nature ought ever to prefide, in that case more particularly, he should as nearly as possible be approximated to his perfection.

The confecration of the state, by a state religious establishment, is necessary also to operate with an wholesome awe upon free citizens; because, in order to secure their freedom, they must enjoy some determinate portion of power. To them them therefore a religion connected with the state. and with their duty towards it, becomes even more necessary than in such societies, where the people by the terms of their subjection are confined to private fentiments, and the management of their own family concerns. All perfons poffeffing any portion of power ought to be ftrongly and awefully impressed with an idea that they act in trust; and that they are to account for their conduct in that trust to the one great master, author and founder of fociety.

This principle ought even to be more ftrongly impressed upon the minds of those who compose the collective sovereignty than upon those of fingle princes. Without instruments, these princes can do nothing. Whoever uses instruments, in finding helps, finds also impediments. Their power is therefore by no means compleat; nor are they fafe in extreme abuse. Such persons, however elevated by flattery, arrogance, and felf-opinion, must be fensible that. whether covered or not by positive law, in some way or other they are accountable even here for the abuse of their trust. If they are not cut off by a rebellion of their people, they may be strangled by the very Janissaries kept for their fecurity against all other rebellion. Thus we have feen the king of France fold by his foldiers for an encrease of pay. But where popular authority is absolute and unrestrained, the people have an infinitely greater, because a far better founded confidence in their own power. They are themselves, in a great meafure, fure, their own instruments. They are nearer to their objects. Besides, they are less under refponfibility to one of the greatest controlling powers on earth, the fense of fame and estimamation. The share of infamy that is likely to fall to the lot of each individual in public acts, is fmall indeed; the operation of opinion being in the inverse ratio to the number of those who abuse power. Their own approbation of their own acts has to them the appearance of a public judgment in their favour. A perfect democracy is therefore the most shameless thing in the world. As it is the most shameless, it is also the most fearlefs. No man apprehends in his person he can be made subject to punishment. Certainly the people at large never ought: for as all punishments are for example towards the conservation of the people at large, the people at large can never become the fubject of punishment by any human hand*. It is therefore of infinite importance that they fhould not be fuffered to imagine that their will, any more than that of kings, is the standard of right and wrong. They ought to be perfuaded that they are full as little entitled, and far less qualified, with fafety to themselves, to use any arbitrary power whatfoever; that therefore they are not, under a false shew of liberty, but, in truth, to exercise an unnatural inverted domination, tyrannically to exact. from those who officiate in the state, not an entire devotion to their interest, which is their right,

Quicquid multis peccatur inultum. but thouse to hant whole effence is good than

but an abject submission to their occasional will a extinguishing thereby, in all those who serve them, all moral principle, all fense of dignity, all use of judgment, and all consistency of character, whilst by the very same process they give themselves up a proper, a suitable, but a most contemptible prey to the service ambition of popular fycophants or courtly flatterers.

When the people have emptied themselves of all the luft of felfish will, which without religion it is utterly impossible they ever should, when they are conscious that they exercise, and exercife perhaps in an higher link of the order of delegation, the power, which to be legitimate must be according to that eternal immutable law, in which will and reason are the same, they will be more careful how they place power in base and incapable hands. In their nomination to office, they will not appoint to the exercise of authority, as to a pitiful job, but as to an holy function; not according to their fordid felfish interest, nor to their wanton caprice, nor to their arbitrary will; but they will confer that power (which any man may well tremble to give or to receive) on those only, in whom they may difcern that predominant proportion of active virtue and wisdom, taken together and fitted to the charge, fach, as in the great and inevitable mixed mass of human impersections and infirmities, is to be found.

When they are habitually convinced that no evil can be acceptable, either in the act or the permission, to him whose effence is good, they will

will be better able to extirpate out of the minds of all magistrates, civil, ecclesiastical, or military, any thing that bears the least resemblance to a proud and lawless domination.

But one of the first and most leading principles on which the commonwealth and the laws are confecrated, is left the temporary possessors and life-renters in it, unmindful of what they have received from their ancestors, or of what is due to their posterity, should act as if they were the entire mafters; that they should not think it amongst their rights to cut off the entail, or commit waste on the inheritance, by destroying at their pleasure the whole original fabric of their fociety; hazarding to leave to those who come after them, a ruin instead of an habitation-and teaching these successors as little to respect their contrivances, as they had themselves respected the inflitations of their forefathers. By this unprincipled facility of changing the state as often. and as much, and in as many ways as there are floating fancies or fashions, the whole chain and continuity of the commonwealth would be broken. No one generation could link with the other. Men would become little better than the flies of a fummer.

And first of all the science of jurisprudence, the pride of the human intellect, which, with all its defects, redundancies, and errors, is the collected reason of ages, combining the principles of original justice with the infinite variety of human concerns, as a heap of old exploded errors, would be no longer studied.

Personal

Personal self-sufficiency and arrogance (the certain attendants upon all those who have never experienced a wisdom greater than their own) would usurp the tribunal. Of course, no certain laws, establishing invariable grounds of hope and fear, would keep the actions of men in a certain course, or direct them to a certain end. Nothing stable in the modes of holding property, or exercifing function, could form a folid ground on which any parent could speculate in the education of his offspring, or in a choice for their future establishment in the world. No principles would be early worked into the habits. As foon as the most able instructor had completed his laborious course of institution, instead of fending forth his pupil, accomplished in a virtuous discipline, fitted to procure him attention and respect, in his place in society, he would find every thing altered; and that he had turned out a poor creature to the contempt and derision of the world, ignorant of the true grounds of estimation. Who would insure a tender and delicate fense of honour to beat almost with the first pulses of the heart, when no man could know what would be the test of honour in a nation, continually varying the standard of its coin? No part of life would retain its acquisitions. Barbarisin with regard to science and literature, unskilfulness with regard to arts and manufactures, would infallibly fucceed to the want of a fteady education and fettled principle; and thus the commonwealth itself would, in a few generations, crumble away, be disconnected into the duft dust and powder of individuality, and at length dispersed to all the winds of heaven.

To avoid therefore the evils of inconstancy and versatility, ten thousand times worse than those of obstinacy and the blindest prejudice, we have confecrated the state, that no man should approach to look into defects or corruptions but with due caution; that he should never dream of beginning its reformation by its subversion; that he should approach to the faults of the state as to the wounds of a father, with pious awe and trembling follicitude. By this wife prejudice we are taught to look with horror on those children of their country who, are prompt rashly to hack that aged parent in pieces, and put him into the kettle of magicians, in hopes that by their poisonous weeds, and wild incantations, they may regenerate the paternal conflitution, and renovate their father's life.

Society is indeed a contract. Subordinate contracts for objects of mere occasional interest may be dissolved at pleasure—but the state ought not to be considered as nothing better than a partner-ship agreement in a trade of pepper and cossee, callico or tobacco, or some other such low concern, to be taken up for a little temporary interest, and to be dissolved by the fancy of the parties. It is to be looked on with other reverence; because it is not a partnership in things subservient only to the gross animal existence of a temporary and perishable nature. It is a partnership in all science; a partnership in all art; a partnership in every virtue, and in all persection. As the ends of fuch a partnership cannot be obtained in many generations, it becomes a partnership not only between those who are living, but between those who are living, those who are dead, and those who are to be born. Each contract of each particular state is but a clause in the great primæval contract of eternal fociety, linking the lower with the higher natures, connecting the visible and invisible world according to a fixed compact fanctioned by the inviolable oath which holds all physical and all moral natures, each in their appointed place. This law is not subject to the will of those, who by an obligation above them, and infinitely fuperior, are bound to fubmit their will to that law. The municipal corporations of that univerfal kingdom are not morally at liberty at their pleasure, and on their speculations of a contingent improvement, wholly to feparate and tear afunder the bands of their fubordinate community, and to diffolve it into an unfocial, uncivil, unconnected chaos of elementary principles. It is the first and supreme neceffity only, a necessity that is not chosen but chooses, a necessity paramount to deliberation, that admits no discussion, and demands no evidence, which alone can justify a refort to anarchy. This necessity is no exception to the rule; because this necessity itself is a part too of that moral and physical disposition of things to which man must be obedient by consent or force; but if that which is only fubmission to necessity should be made the object of choice, the law is broken.

broken, nature is disobeyed, and the rebellious are outlawed, cast forth, and exiled, from this world of reason, and order, and peace, and virtue, and fruitful penitence, into the antagonist world of madness, discord, vice, consusting, and unavailing forrow.

Thefe, my dear Sir, are, were, and I think long will be the fentiments of not the least learned and reflecting part of this kingdom. They who are included in this description, form their opinions on fuch grounds as fuch perfons ought to form them. The less enquiring receive them from an authority which those whom Providence dooms to live on trust need not be ashamed to rely on. These two forts of men move in the fame direction, tho' in a different place. They both move with the order of the universe. They all know or feel this great antient truth: " Quod illi principi et or præpotenti Deo qui omnem hunc mundum " regit, nihil eorum quæ quidem fiant in " terris acceptius quam concilia et cætus ho-" minum jure feciati quæ civitates appellantur." They take this tenet of the head and heart, not from the great name which it immediately bears, nor from the greater from whence it is derived; but from that which alone can give true weight and fanction to any learned opinion, the common nature and common relation of men. Persuaded that all things ought to be done with reference, and referring all to the point of reference to which all should be directed, they think themselves bound, not only as individuals in the functuary of the heart, or as congregated in that perfonal personal capacity, to renew the memory of their high origin and cast; but also in their corporate character to perform their national homage to the institutor, and author and protector of civil fociety; without which civil fociety man could not by any possibility arrive at the perfection of which his nature is capable, nor even make a remote and faint approach to it. They conceive that He who gave our nature to be perfected by our virtue, willed also the neceffary means of its perfection - He willed therefore the flate-He willed its connexion with the fource and original archetype of all perfection. They who are convinced of this his will, which is the law of laws and the fovereign of fovereigns, cannot think it reprehensible, that this our corporate fealty and homage, that this our recognition of a figniory paramount, I had almost faid this oblation of the state itself, as a worthy offering on the high altar of univerfal praise, should be performed as all publick folemn acts are performed, in buildings, in musick, in decoration, in speech, in the dignity of persons, according to the customs of mankind, taught by their nature; that is, with modest splendour, with unaffuming state, with mild majefty and fober pomp. For those purpofes they think fome part of the wealth of the country is as ufefully employed as it can be, in fomenting the luxury of individuals. It is the publick ornament. It is the publick confolation. It nourishes the publick hope. The poorest man finds his own importance and dignity nity in it, whilft the wealth and pride of individuals at every moment makes the man of humble rank and fortune fensible of his inferiority, and degrades and vilifies his condition. It is for the man in humble life, and to raise his nature, and to put him in mind of a state in which the privileges of opulence will cease, when he will be equal by nature, and may be more than equal by virtue, that this portion of the general wealth of his country is employed and fanctified.

I affure you I do not aim at fingularity. I give you opinions which have been accepted amongft us, from very early times to this moment, with a continued and general approbation, and which indeed are fo worked into my mind, that I am unable to diffinguish what I have learned from others from the results of my own meditation.

It is on some such principles that the majority of the people of England, far from thinking a religious, national establishment unlawful, hardly think it lawful to be without one. In France you are wholly mistaken if you do not believe us above all other things attached to it, and beyond all other nations; and when this people has acted unwisely and unjustishably in its savour (as in some instances they have done most certainly) in their very errors you will at least discover their zeal.

This principle runs through the whole fystem of their polity. They do not consider their church establishment as convenient, but as effential to their state; not as a thing heterogeneous and separable; something added for accommodation:

commodation; what they may either keep up or lay afide, according to their temporary ideas of convenience. They confider it as the foundation of their whole conflitution, with which, and with every part of which, it holds an indiffoluble union. Church and state are ideas inseparable in their minds, and scarcely is the one ever mentioned without mentioning the other.

Our education is fo formed as to confirm and fix this impression. Our education is in a manner wholly in the hands of ecclefiaftics, and in all stages from infancy to manhood. Even when our youth, leaving schools and universities, enter that most important period of life which begins to link experience and fludy together, and when with that view they visit other countries, instead of old domestics whom we have feen as governors to principal men from other parts, threefourths of those who go abroad with our young nobility and gentlemen are ecclefiaftics; not as austere masters, nor as mere followers; but as friends and companions of a graver character, and not feldom persons as well born as themselves. With them, as relations, they most commonly keep up a close connexion through life. By this connexion we conceive that we attach our gentlemen to the church; and we liberalize the church by an intercourse with the leading characters of the country.

So tenacious are we of the old ecclefiaftical modes and fashions of institution, that very little alteration has been made in them since the four-teenth or sisteenth century; adhering in this particular, as in all things else, to our old settled maxim, never entirely nor at once to depart from We found these old institutions, on the whole, favourable to morality and discipline; and we thought they were fusceptible of amendment, without altering the ground. We thought that they were capable of receiving and meliorating, and above all of preferving the accessions of science and literature, as the order of Providence should successively produce them. And after all, with this Gothic and monkish education (for such it is in the ground-work) we may put in our claim to as ample and as early a share in all the improvements in science, in arts, and in literature, which have illuminated and adorned the modern world, as any other nation in Europe; we think one main cause of this improvement was our not despising the patrimony of knowledge which was left us by our forefathers.

It is from our attachment to a church establishment that the English nation did not think it wife to entrust that great fundamental interest of the whole to what they trust no part of their civil or military public fervice, that is to the unfteady and precarious contribution of individuals. They go further. They certainly never have fuffered and never will fuffer the fixed eftate of the church to be converted into a penfion, to depend on the treasury, and to be delayed, withheld, or perhaps to be extinguished by fiscal difficulties; which difficulties may sometimes be pretended for political purposes, and are in fact often brought on by the extravagance, negligence, L 3 negligence, and rapacity of politicians. The people of England think that they have conflitutional motives, as well as religious, against any project of turning their independent clergy into ecclesiastical pensioners of state. They tremble for their liberty, from the influence of a clergy dependent on the crown; they tremble for the public tranquillity from the disorders of a factious clergy, if it were made to depend upon any other than the crown. They therefore made their church, like their king and their nobility, independent.

From the united considerations of religion and constitutional policy, from their opinion of a duty to make a sure provision for the consolation of the seeble and the instruction of the ignorant, they have incorporated and identified the estate of the church with the mass of private property, of which the state is not the proprietor, either for use or dominion, but the guardian only and the regulator. They have ordained that the provision of this establishment might be as stable as the earth on which it stands, and should not sluctuate with the Eu-ripus of funds and actions.

The men of England, the men, I mean, of light and leading in England, whose wisdom (if they have any) is open and direct, would be ashamed, as of a filly deceitful trick, to profess any religion in name, which by their proceedings they appeared to contemn. If by their conduct (the only language that rarely lies) they seemed to regard the great ruling principle of the moral and the natural world, as a mere invention to keep the vulgar in obedience, they apprehend that by fuch a conduct they would defeat the politic purpose they have in view. They would find it difficult to make others to believe in a fystem to which they manifestly gave no credit themselves. The Christian statesmen of this land would indeed first provide for the multitude : because it is the multitude; and is therefore, as such, the first object in the ecclesiastical institution, and in all institutions. They have been taught, that the circumftance of the gospel's being preached to the poor, was one of the great tests of its true mission. They think, therefore, that those do not believe it, who do not take care it should be preached to the poor. But as they know that charity is not confined to any one description, but ought to apply itself to all men who have wants, they are not deprived of a due and anxious fensation of pity to the distresses of the miserable great. They are not repelled through a fastidious delicacy, at the ftench of their arrogance and prefumption, from a medicinal attention to their mental blotches and running fores. They are fenfible, that religious instruction is of more consequence to them than to any others; from the greatness of the temptation to which they are exposed; from the important confequences that attend their faults; from the contagion of their ill example; from the necessity of bowing down the stubborn neck of their pride and ambition to the yoke of moderation and virtue; from a confideration of the fat stupidity and gross ignorance concerning L 4

what imports men most to know, which prevails at courts, and at the head of armies, and in senates, as much as at the loom and in the field.

The English people are fatisfied, that to the great the confolations of religion are as necessary as its inftructions. They too are among the unhappy. They feel perfonal pain and domestic forrow. In these they have no privilege, but are fubject to pay their full contingent to the contributions levied on mortality. They want this fovereign balm under their gnawing cares and anxieties, which being less conversant about the limited wants of animal life, range without limit, and are diversified by infinite combinations in the wild and unbounded regions of imagination. Some charitable dole is wanting to these, our often very unhappy brethren, to fill the gloomy void that reigns in minds which have nothing on earth to hope or fear; fomething to relieve in the killing languor and over-laboured lassitude of those who have nothing to do; fomething to excite an appetite to existence in the palled satiety which attends on all pleafures which may be bought, where nature is not left to her own process, where even defire is anticipated, and therefore fruition defeated by meditated schemes and contrivances of delight; and no interval, no obstacle, is interposed between the wish and the accomplishment.

The people of England know how little influence the teachers of religion are likely to have with the wealthy and powerful of long standing, and how much less with the newly fortunate, if they appear in a manner no way afforted to those with whom they must associate, and over whom they must even exercise, in some cases, something like an authority. What must they think of that body of teachers, if they fee it in no part above the establishment of their domestic fervants? If the poverty were voluntary, there might be some difference. Strong instances of felf-denial operate powerfully on our minds; and a man who has no wants has obtained great freedom and firmness, and even dignity. But as the mass of any description of men are but men, and their poverty cannot be voluntary, that difrespect which attends upon all Lay poverty, will not depart from the Ecclefiaftical. Our provident constitution has therefore taken care that those who are to instruct presumptuous ignorance, those who are to be censors over infolent vice, should neither incur their contempt, nor live upon their alms; nor will it tempt the rich to a neglect of the true medicine of their minds. For these reasons, whilst we provide first for the poor, and with a parental folicitude, we have not relegated religion (like fomething wewere ashamed to shew) to obscure municipalities or rustic villages. No! We will have her to exalt her mitred front in courts and parliaments. We will have her mixed throughout the whole mass of life, and blended with all the classes of fociety. The people of England will shew to the haughty potentates.

potentates of the world, and to their talking fophisters, that a free, a generous, an informed nation, honours the high magistrates of its church; that it will not fuffer the infolence of wealth and titles, or any other species of proud pretention, to look down with fcorn upon what they look up to with reverence; nor presume to trample on that acquired perfonal nobility, which they intend always to be, and which often is the fruit, not the reward, (for what can be the reward?) of learning, piety, and virtue. They can fee, without pain or grudging, an Archbishop precede a Duke. They can fee a Bishop of Durham, or a Bishop of Winchester, in possession of ten thousand pounds a year; and cannot conceive why it is in worfe hands than estates to the like amount in the hands of this Earl, or that Squire; although it may be true, that fo many dogs and horses are not kept by the former, and fed with the victuals which ought to nourish the children of the people. It is true, the whole church revenue is not always employed, and to every shilling, in charity; nor perhaps ought it; but fomething is generally fo employed. It is better to cherish virtue and humanity, by leaving much to free will, even with fome loss to the object, than to attempt to make men mere machines and instruments of a political benevolence. The world on the whole will gain by a liberty, without which virtue cannot exist.

When once the commonwealth has established the the estates of the church as property, it can, consistently, hear nothing of the more or the less. Too much and too little are treason against property. What evil can arise from the quantity in any hand, whilst the supreme authority has the full, sovereign superintendance over this, as over all property, to prevent every species of abuse; and, whenever it notably deviates, to give to it a direction agreeable to the purposes of its institution.

In England most of us conceive that it is envy and malignity towards those who are often the beginners of their own fortune, and not a love of the felf-denial and mortification of the antient church, that makes fome look afkance at the diffinctions, and honours, and revenues, which, taken from no person, are set apart for virtue. The ears of the people of England are diftinguishing. They hear these men speak broad. Their tongue betrays them. Their language is in the patois of fraud; in the cant and gibberish of hypocrify. The people of England must think so, when these praters affect to carry back the clergy to that primitive evangelic poverty which, in the spirit, ought always to exist in them, (and in us too, however we may like it) but in the thing must be varied, when the relation of that body to the state is altered; when manners, when modes of life, when indeed the whole order of human affairs has undergone a total revolution. We shall believe those reformers to be then honest enthusiasts, not as now we think them, cheats cheats and deceivers, when we fee them throwing their own goods into common, and fubmitting their own perfons to the auftere difcipline of the early church.

With these ideas rooted in their minds, the commons of Great Britain, in the national emergencies, will never feek their refource from the confiscation of the estates of the church and poor. Sacrilege and profcription are not among the ways and means in our committee of fupply. The Jews in Change Alley have not yet dared to hint their hopes of a mortgage on the revenues belonging to the fee of Canterbury. I am not afraid that I shall be disavowed, when I affure you that there is not one public man in this kingdom, whom you would wish to quote; no not one of any party or description, who does not reprobate the dishonest, perfidious, and cruel confiscation which the national affembly has been compelled to make of that property which it was their first duty to protect.

It is with the exultation of a little natural pride I tell you, that those amongst us who have wished to pledge the societies of Paris in the cup of their abominations, have been disappointed. The robbery of your church has proved a security to the possessions of ours. It has roused the people. They see with horror and alarm that enormous and shameless act of proscription. It has opened, and will more and more open their eyes upon the selfish enlargement of mind, and the narrow liberality of sentiment timent of infidious men, which commencing in close hypocrify and fraud have ended in open violence and rapine. At home we behold similar beginnings. We are on our guard against similar conclusions.

I hope we shall never be so totally lost to all fense of the duties imposed upon us by the law of focial union, as, upon any pretext of public fervice, to confiscate the goods of a fingle unoffending citizen. Who but a tyrant (a name expressive of every thing which can vitiate and degrade human nature) could think of feizing on the property of men, unaccused, unheard, untried, by whole descriptions, by hundreds and thousands together? who that had not loft every trace of humanity could think of casting down men of exalted rank and facred function, fome of them of an age to call at once for reverence and compassion, of casting them down from the highest situation in the commonwealth, wherein they were maintained by their own landed property, to a flate of indigence, depression and contempt?

The conficators truly have made fome allowance to their victims from the scraps and fragments of their own tables from which they have been so harshly driven, and which have been so bountifully spread for a feast to the harpies of usury. But to drive men from independence to live on alms is itself great cruelty. That which might be a tolerable condition to men in one state of life, and not habituated to other things, may, when all these circumstances are altered, be a dreadful revolution; and one to which a virtuous mind would feel pain in condemning any guilt except that which would demand the life of the offender. But to many minds this punishment of degradation and infamy is worse than death. Undoubtedly it is an infinite aggravation of this cruel fuffering, that the persons who were taught a double prejudice in favour of religion, by education and by the place they held in the administration of its functions, are to receive the remnants of their property as alms from the profane and impious hands of those who had plundered them of all the rest; to receive (if they are at all to receive) not from the charitable contributions of the faithful, but from the infolent tenderness of known and avowed Atheism, the maintenance of religion, measured out to them on the standard of the contempt in which it is held; and for the purpose of rendering those who receive the allowance vile and of no estimation in the eyes of mankind.

But this act of feizure of property, it feems, is a judgment in law, and not a confifcation. They have, it feems, found out in the academies of the Palais Royale, and the Jacobins, that certain men had no right to the possessions which they held under law, usage, the decisions of courts, and the accumulated prescription of a thousand years. They say that ecclesiastics are sictitious persons, creatures of the state; whom at pleasure they may destroy, and of course limit and modify in every particular; that the goods they possess are not properly perly theirs, but belong to the state which created the siction; and we are therefore not to trouble ourselves with what they may suffer in their natural seelings and natural persons, on account of what is done towards them in this their constructive character. Of what import is it, under what names you injure men, and deprive them of the just emoluments of a profession, in which they were not only permitted but encouraged by the state to engage; and upon the supposed certainty of which emoluments they had formed the plan of their lives, contracted debts, and led multitudes to an entire dependence upon them?

You do not imagine, Sir, that I am going to compliment this miserable distinction of persons with any long discussion. The arguments of tyranny are as contemptible as its force is dreadful. Had not your confifcators by their early crimes obtained a power which fecures indemnity to all the crimes of which they have fince been guilty, or that they can commit, it is not the fyllogism of the logician but the lash of the executioner that would have refuted a fophistry which becomes an accomplice of theft and murder. The fophistick tyrants of Paris are loud in their declamations against the departed regal tyrants who in former ages have vexed the world. They are thus bold, because they are fafe from the dungeons and iron cages of their old masters. Shall we be more tender of the tyrants of our own time, when we fee them acting worse tragedies under under our eyes? shall we not use the same liberty that they do, when we can use it with the same safety? when to speak honest truth only requires a contempt of the opinions of those whose actions we abhor?

This outrage on all the rights of property was at first covered with what, on the system of their conduct, was the most astonishing of all pretexts-a regard to national faith. The enemies to property at first pretended a most tender, delicate, and fcrupulous anxiety for keeping the king's engagements with the public creditor. These professors of the rights of men are so bufy in teaching others, that they have not leifure to learn any thing themselves; otherwise they would have known that it is to the property of the citizen, and not to the demands of the creditor of the state, that the first and original faith of civil fociety is pledged. The claim of the citizen is prior in time, paramount in title, fuperior in equity. The fortunes of individuals, whether poffeffed by acquisition, or by descent, or in virtue of a participation in the goods of fome community, were no part of the creditor's fecurity, expressed or implied. They never fo much as entered into his head when he made his bargain. He well knew that the public, whether represented by a monarch, or by a fenate, can pledge nothing but the public estate; and it can have no public effate, except in what it derives from a just and proportioned imposition upon the citizens at large. This was engaged, gage, and nothing else could be engaged to the public creditor. No man can mortgage his injustice as a pawn for his fidelity.

It is impossible to avoid some observation on the contradictions caused by the extreme rigour and the extreme laxity of the new public faith, which influenced in this transaction, and which influenced not according to the nature of the obligation, but to the description of the persons to whom it was engaged. No acts of the old government of the kings of France are held valid in the National Affembly, except its pecuniary engagements; acts of all others of the most ambiguous legality. The rest of the acts of that royal government are confidered in fo odious a light, that to have a claim under its authority is looked on as a fort of crime. A pension, given as a reward for service to the state, is furely as good a ground of property as any fecurity for money advanced to the state. It is a better; for money is paid, and well paid, to obtain that fervice. We have however feen multitudes of people under this description in France, who never had been deprived of their allowances by the most arbitrary ministers, in the most arbitrary times, by this affembly of the rights of men, robbed without mercy. They were told, in answer to their claim to the bread earned with their blood, that their fervices had not been rendered to the country that now exists.

This laxity of public faith is not confined to those unfortunate persons. The assembly, with persect consistency it must be owned, is engaged in a respectable deliberation how far it is bound by the treaties made with other nations under the former government, and their Committee is to report which of them they ought to ratify, and which not. By this means they have put the external fidelity of this virgin state on a par with its internal.

It is not easy to conceive upon what rational principle the royal government should not, of the two, rather have possessed the power of rewarding fervice, and making treaties, in virtue of its prerogative, than that of pledging to creditors the revenue of the state actual and possible. The treasure of the nation, of all things, has been the least allowed to the prerogative of the king of France, or to the prerogative of any king in Europe. To mortgage the public revenue implies the fovereign dominion, in the fullest sense, over the public purse. It goes far beyond the trust even of a temporary and occasional taxation. The acts however of that dangerous power (the distinctive mark of a boundless despotism) have been alone held facred. Whence arose this preference given by a democratic affembly to a body of property deriving its title from the most critical and obnoxious of all the exertions of monarchical authority? Reason can furnish nothing to reconcile inconfiftency; nor can partial favour be accounted for upon equitable principles. But the contradiction and partiality which admit no justification, are not the less without an adequate cause; and that cause I do not think it difficult to discover.

By the vast debt of France a great monied interest had insensibly grown up, and with it a great power. By the ancient usages which prevailed in that kingdom, the general circulation of property, and in particular the mutual convertibility of land into money, and of money into land, had always been a matter of difficulty. Family fettlements, rather more general and more strict than they are in England, the jus retractus, the great mass of landed property held by the crown, and by a maxim of the French law held unalienably, the vast estates of the ecclefiaftic corporations,-all these had kept the landed and monied interests more seperated in France, less miscible, and the owners of the two distinct species of property not so well disposed to each other as they are in this country.

The monied property was long looked on with rather an evil eye by the people. They faw it connected with their diffresses, and aggravating them. It was no less envied by the old landed interests, partly for the same reasons that rendered it obnoxious to the people, but much more fo as it eclipfed, by the fplendour of an oftentatious luxury, the unendowed pedigrees and naked titles of feveral among the nobility. Even when the nobility, which represented the more permanent landed interest, united themselves by marriage (which sometimes was the case) with the other description, the wealth which faved the family from ruin, was supposed to contaminate and degrade it. Thus the enmities and heart-burnings of thefe M 2 parties parties were encreased even by the usual means by which discord is made to cease, and quarrels are turned into friendship. In the mean time, the pride of the wealthy men, not noble or newly noble, encreased with its cause. They felt with refentment an inferiority, the grounds of which they did not acknowledge. There was no measure to which they were not willing to lend themselves, in order to be revenged of the outrages of this rival pride, and to exalt their wealth to what they confidered as its natural rank and estimation. They struck at the nobility through the crown and the church. They attacked them particularly on the fide on which they thought them the most vulnerable, that is, the possessions of the church, which, through the patronage of the crown, generally devolved upon the nobility. The bishopricks, and the great commendatory abbies, were, with few exceptions, held by that order.

In this state of real, though not always perceived warfare between the noble ancient landed interest, and the new monied interest, the greatest because the most applicable strength was in the hands of the latter. The monied interest is in its nature more ready for any adventure; and its posseffors more disposed to new enterprizes of any kind. Being of a recent acquisition, it falls in more naturally with any novelties. It is therefore the kind of wealth which will be resorted to by all who wish for change.

Along with the monied interest, a new defeription of men had grown up, with whom that interest interest foon formed a close and marked union; I mean the political Men of Letters. Men of Letters, fond of distinguishing themselves, are rarely averse to innovation. Since the decline of the life and greatness of Lewis the XIVth, they were not fo much cultivated either by him, or by the regent, or the fucceffors to the crown; nor were they engaged to the court by favours and emoluments fo fystematically as during the splendid period of that oftentatious and not impolitic reign. What they loft in the old court protection, they endeavoured to make up by joining in a fort of incorporation of their own; to which the two academies of France, and afterwards the vast undertaking of the Encyclopædia, carried on by a fociety of these gentlemen, did not a little contribute.

The literary cabal had some years ago formed fomething like a regular plan for the destruction of the Christian religion. This object they purfued with a degree of zeal which hitherto had been discovered only in the propagators of some fystem of piety. They were possessed with a spirit of profelytism in the most, fanatical degree; and from thence, by an easy progress, with the spirit of persecution according to their means. What was not to be done towards their great end by any direct or immediate act, might be wrought by a longer process through the medium of opinion. To command that opinion, the first step is to establish a dominion over those who direct it. They contrived to possess themselves, with great method and perseverance, of all the avenues to literary fame. Many of them indeed flood M 3 flood high in the ranks of literature and fcience. The world had done them justice; and in favour of general talents forgave the evil tendency of their peculiar principles. This was true liberality; which they returned by endeavouring to confine the reputation of fense, learning, and tafte to themselves or their followers. I will venture to fay that this narrow, exclusive spirit has not been less prejudical to literature and to taste, than to morals and true philosophy These Atheistical fathers have a bigotry of their own; and they have learnt to talk against monks with the spirit of a monk. But in some things they are men of the world. The refources of intrigue are called in to supply the defects of argument and wit. To this fystem of literary monopoly was joined an unremitting industry to blacken and discredit in every way, and by every means, all those who did not hold to their faction. To those who have observed the spirit of their conduct, it has long been clear that nothing was wanted but the power of carrying the intolerance of the tongue and of the pen into a persecution which would strike at property, liberty, and life.

The defultory and faint perfecution carried on against them, more from compliance with form and decency than with serious resentment, neither weakened their strength, nor relaxed their efforts. The issue of the whole was, that what with opposition, and what with success, a violent and malignant zeal, of a kind hitherto unknown in the world, had taken an entire possession of their minds, and rendered their whole conversation, which otherwise would have been pleasing and instructive.

structive, perfectly difgusting. A spirit of cabal, intrigue, and profelytism, pervaded all their thoughts, words, and actions. And, as controverfial zeal foon turns its thoughts on force, they began to infinuate themselves into a correspondence with foreign princes; in hopes, through their authority, which at first they flattered, they might bring about the changes they had in view. To them it was indifferent whether thefe changes were to be accomplished by the thunderbolt of despotism, or by the earthquake of popular commotion. The correspondence between this cabal, and the late king of Prussia, will throw no fmall light upon the spirit of all their proceedings *. For the same purpose for which they intrigued with princes, they cultivated, in a diffinguished manner, the monied interest of France; and partly through the means furnished by those whose peculiar offices gave them the most extentensive and certain means of communication, they carefully occupied all the avenues to opinion.

Writers, especially when they act in a body, and with one direction, have great influence on the publick mind; the alliance therefore of these writers with the monied interest had no small effect in removing the popular odium and envy which attended that species of wealth. These writers, like the propagators of all novelties, pretended to a great zeal for the poor, and the lower orders, whilst in their satires they rendered hateful, by every exaggeration, the saults of courts, of nobility, and of priesthood. They became a fort of demagogues. They served as a link to unite, in favour of one object, obnoxious wealth to restless and desperate poverty.

As these two kinds of men appear principal leaders in all the late transactions, their junction and politics will ferve to account, not upon any principles of law or of policy, but as a caufe, for the general fury with which all the landed property of ecclefiaftical corporations has been attacked; and the great care which, contrary to their pretended principles, has been taken, of a monied interest originating from the authority of the crown. All the envy against wealth and power, was artificially directed against other descriptions of riches. On what other principles than that which I have stated can we account for an appearance fo extraordinary and unnatural as that of the ecclefiaftical possessions, which had stood so many fuccessions of ages and shocks of civil violences, and were guarded at once by justice, and by prejudice, being applied to the payment of debts, comparitively recent, inviduous, and contracted by a decried and subverted government?

Was the public estate a sufficient stake for the public debts? Assume that it was not, and that a loss must be incurred somewhere—When the only estate lawfully possessed, and which the contracting parties had in contemplation at the time in which their bargain was made, happens to fail, who, according to the principles of natural and legal equity, ought to be the sufferer? Certainly it ought to be either the parry who trusted; or the party who persuaded him to trust; or both;

and not third parties who had no concern with the transaction. Upon any insolvency they ought to suffer who were weak enough to lend upon bad security, or they who fraudulently held out a security that was not valid. Laws are acquainted with no other rules of decision. But by the new institute of the rights of men, the only persons, who in equity ought to suffer, are the only persons who are to be saved harmless: those are to answer the debt who neither were lenders or borrowers, mortgagers or mortgagees.

What had the clergy to do with these transactions? What had they to do with any publick engagement further than the extent of their own debt? To that, to be fure, their estates were bound to the last acre. Nothing can lead · more to the true spirit of the assembly, which fits for public confiscation, with its new equity and its new morality, than an attention to their proceeding with regard to this debt of the clergy. The body of confiscators, true to that monied interest for which they were false to every other, have found the clergy competent to incur a legal debt, Of courfe they declared them legally entitled to the property which their power of incurring the debt and mortgaging the estate implied; recognizing the rights of those persecuted citizens, in the very act in which they were thus grossly violated.

If, as I faid, any persons are to make good deficiencies to the public creditor, besides the public at large, they must be those who managed the agreement. Why therefore are not the estates of all the comptrollers general confiscated?

Why not those of the long fuccession of ministers, financiers, and bankers who have been enriched whilft the nation was impoverished by their dealings and their counsels? Why is not the estate of Mr. Laborde declared forfeited rather than of the archbishop of Paris, who has had nothing to do in the creation or in the jobbing of the public funds? Or, if you must confiscate old landed estates in favour of the money-jobbers, why is the penalty confined to one description? I do not know whether the expences of the duke de Choiseul have left any thing of the infinite fums which he had derived from the bounty of his mafter, during the transactions of a reign which contributed largely, by every species of prodigality in war and peace, to the present debt of France. If any fuch remains, why is not this confifcated? I remember to have been in Paris during the time of the old government. I was there just after the duke d'Aiguillon had been snatched (as it was generally thought) from the block by the hand of a protecting despotism. He was a minister, and had some concern in the affairs of that prodigal period. Why do I not fee his estate delivered up to the municipalities in which it is fituated? The noble family of Noailles have long been fervants. (meritorious fervants I admit) to the crown of France, and have had of course some share in its bounties. Why do I hear nothing of the application of their estates to the public debt? Why is the estate of the duke de Rochefoucault more facred than that of the cardinal de Rochefoucault? The former is, I doubt not, a worthy person:

perfon; and (if it were not a fort of profaneness to talk of the use, as affecting the title to property) he makes a good use of his revenues; but it is no disrespect to him to say, what authentic information well warrants me in saying, that the use made of a property equally valid, by his brother the cardinal archbishop of Rouen, was far more laudable and far more public-spirited. Can one hear of the proscription of such persons, and the consistation of their effects, without indignation and horror? He is not a man who does not feel such emotions on such occasions. He does not deserve the name of a free man who will not express them, Few barbarous conquerors have ever made fo terrible a revolution in property. None of the heads of the Roman factions, when they established "crudelem illam Hastam" in all their auctions of rapine, have ever fet up to fale the goods of the conquered citizen to fuch an enormous amount. It must be allowed in favour of those tyrants of antiquity, that what was done by them could hardly be faid to be done in cold blood. Their passions were inflamed, their tempers foured, their understandings confused, with the spirit of revenge, with the innumerable reciprocated and recent inflictions and retaliations of blood and rapine. They were driven beyond all bounds of moderation by the apprehension of the return of power with the return of property to the families of those they had injured beyond all hope of forgiveness.

These Roman confiscators, who were yet only in the elements of tyranny, and were not infiructed in the rights of men to exercise all forts of cruelties on each other without provocation, thought it necessary to spread a fort of colour over their injustice. They considered the vanquished party as composed of traitors who had borne arms, or otherwise had acted with hostility against the commonwealth. They regarded them as persons who had forseited their property by their crimes. With you, in your improved state of the human mind, there was no fuch formality. You feized upon five millions fterling of annual rent, and turned forty or fifty thousand human creatures out of their houses, because " such was your pleafure." The tyrant, Harry the Eighth of England, as he was not better enlightened than the Roman Marius's and Sylla's, and had not studied in your new schools, did not know what an effectual instrument of despotisin was to be found in that grand magazine of offenfive weapons, the rights of men. When he refolved to rob the abbies, as the club of the Jacobins have robbed all the ecclefiaftics, he began by fetting on foot a commisfion to examine into the crimes and abuses which prevailed in those communities. As it might be expected, his commission reported truths, exaggerations, and falshoods. But truly or falfely it reported abuses and offences. However, as abuses might be corrected, as every crime of perfons does not infer a forfeiture with regard to communities, and as property, in that dark age, was not discovered to be a creature of prejudice, all those abuses (and there were enough of

of them) were hardly thought sufficient ground ' for such a confiscation as it was for his purposes ! to make. He therefore procured the formal furrender of these estates. All these operose proceedings were adopted by one of the most decided tyrants in the rolls of history, as necessary preliminaries, before he could venture, by bribing the members of his two fervile houses with a share of the spoil, and holding out to them an eternal immunity from taxation, to demand a confirmation of his iniquitous proceedings by an act of parliament. Had fate referved him to our times, four technical terms would have done his business, and saved him all this trouble; he needed nothing more than one short form of incantation-" Philosophy, Light, Liberality, the Rights of Men."

I can fay nothing in praise of those acts of tyranny, which no voice has hitherto ever commended under any of their false colours; yet in these false colours an homage was paid by despotism to justice. The power which was above all fear and all remorse was not set above all shame.
Whilst Shame keeps its watch, Virtue is not wholly extinguished in the heart; nor will Moderation be utterly exiled from the minds of tyrants.

I believe every honest man sympathizes in his reflections with our political poet on that occasion, and will pray to avert the omen whenever these acts of rapacious despotism present themselves to his view or his imagination:

But was the state of France so wretched and undone, that no other resource but rapine remained to preserve its existence? On this point I wish to receive some information. When the states met, was the condition at 531,444,000 livres; the fixed revenue at 475,294,000, making the deficiency 56,150,000, or short of 2,200,000 sterling. But to balance it, he brought forward favings and improvements of revenue (confidered as entirely certain) to rather more than the amount of that deficiency; and he concludes with thefe emphatical words (p.39) " Quel pays, Messieurs, que celui, " ou, sans impots et avec de simples objets " inappercus, on peut faire disparoitre un deficit " qui a fait tant de bruit en Europe." As to the re-imbursement, the finking of debt, and the other great objects of public credit and political arrangement indicated in Monf. Necker's speech, no doubt could be entertained, but that a very moderate and proportioned affeliment on the citizens without distinction would have provided for all of them to the fullest extent of their demand.

* Rapport de Mons. le Directeur général des finances, fait par ordre du Roi à Versailles. Mai 5, 1789.

If this representation of Mons. Necker was false, then the assembly are in the highest degree culpable for having forced the king to accept as his minister, and fince the king's deposition, for having employed as their minister, a man who had been capable of abusing so notoriously the considence of his master and their own; in a matter too of the highest moment, and directly appertaining to his particular office. But if the representation was exact (as, having always, along with you, conceived a high degree of respect for Mr. Necker, I make no doubt it was) then what can be said in favour of those, who, instead of moderate, reasonable, and general contribution, have in cold blood, and impelled by no necessity, had recourse to a partial and cruel confiscation?

Was that contribution refused on a pretext of privilege, either on the part of the clergy or on that of the nobility? No certainly. As to the clergy, they even ran before the wishes of the third order. Previous to the meeting of the states, they had in all their instructions expressly directed their deputies to renounce every immunity, which put them upon a footing distinct from the condition of their fellow-subjects. In this renunciation the clergy were even more explicit than the nobility.

But let us suppose that the deficiency had remained at the 56 millions, (or f. 2,200,000 sterling) as at first stated by Mr. Necker. Let us allow that all the refources he opposed to that deficiency were impudent and groundless fictions; and that the affembly (or their lords of articles * at the Jacobins) were from thence justified in laying the whole burthen of that deficiency on the clergy,-yet allowing all this, a necessity of f. 2,200,000 fterling will not support a confiscation to the amount of five millions. The impolition of £. 2,200,000 on the clergy, as partial, would have been oppressive and unjust, but it would not have been altogether ruinous to those on whom it was imposed; and therefore it would not have answered the real purpose of the managers.

^{*} In the conflitution of Scotland during the Stuart reigns, a committee fat for preparing bills; and none could pass, but those previously approved by them. This committee was called lords of articles.

Perhaps persons, unacquainted with the state of France, on hearing the clergy and the nobleffe were privileged in point of taxation, may be led to imagine, that previous to the revolution these bodies had contributed nothing to the state. This is a great mistake. They certainly did not contribute equally with each other, nor either of them equally with the commons. They both however contributed largely. Neither nobility nor clergy enjoyed any exemption from the excise on confumable commodities, from duties of custom, or from any of the other numerous indirect impositions, which in France as well as here, make fo very large a proportion of all payments to the public. The nobleffe paid the capitation. They paid also a land-tax, called the twentieth penny, to the height fometimes of three, fometimes of four shillings in the pound; both of them direct impositions of no light nature, and no trivial produce. The clergy of the provinces annexed by conquest to France (which in extent make about an eighth part of the whole but in wealth a much larger proportion) paid likewise to the capitation and the twentieth penny, at the rate paid by the nobility. The clergy in the old provinces did not pay the capitation; but they had redeemed themselves at the expence of about 24 millions, or a little more than a million flerling. They were exempted from the twentieths; but then they made free gifts; they contracted debts for the flate; and they were fubject to fome other charges, the whole computed at about a thirteenth part of their clear income. They ought to have paid annually about forty thousand thousand pounds more, to put them on a par with the contribution of the nobility.

When the terrors of this tremendous proscription hung over the clergy, they made an offer of a contribution, through the archbishop of Aix, which, for its extravagance, ought not to have been ac cepted. But it was evidently and obviously more advantageous to the public creditor, than any thing which could rationally be promifed by the confifcation. Why was it not accepted? The reason is plain-There was no defire that the church should be brought to ferve the ftate. The fervice of the flate was made a pretext to destroy the church. In their way to the destruction of the church they would not feruple to destroy their country: and they have destroyed it. One great end in the project would have been defeated, if the plan of extortion had been adopted in lieu of the scheme of confiscation. The new landed interest connected with the new republic, and connected with it for its very being, could not have been created. This was among the reafons why that extravagant ranfom was not accepted.

The madness of the project of confiscation, on the plan that was first pretended, soon became apparent. To bring this unwieldy mass of landed property, enlarged by the confiscation of all the vast landed domain of the crown, at once into market, was obviously to defeat the profits proposed by the confiscation, by depreciating the value of those lands, and indeed of all the landed estates throughout France. Such a sudden diversion of all its circulating money from trade to land, must be an additional mischief. What step was taken? Did the affembly, on becoming fenfible of the inevitable ill effects of their projected fale, revert to the offers of the clergy? No diffress could oblige them to travel in a course which was difgraced by any appearance of justice. Giving over all hopes from a general immediate fale, another project feems to have fucceeded. They proposed to take stock in exchange for the church lands. In that project great difficulties arose in equalizing the objects to be exchanged. Other obstacles also presented themselves, which threw them back again upon fome project of fale. The municipalities had taken an alarm. They would not hear of transferring the whole plunder of the kingdom to the stock-holders in Paris. Many of those municipalities had been (upon system) reduced to the most deplorable indigence. Money was no where to be feen. They were therefore led to the point that was fo ardently defired. They panted for a currency of any kind which might revive their perifhing industry. The municipalities were then to be admitted to a share in the spoil, which evidently rendered the first scheme (if ever it had been ferioufly entertained) altogether impracticable. Public exigencies pressed upon all The minister of finance reiterated his call for fupply with a most urgent, anxious, and boding voice. Thus preffed on all fides, inflead of the first plan of converting their bankers into bishops and abbots, instead of paying the old debt, they contracted a new debt, at 3 per cent. creating a new paper currency, founded on an eventual fale of the church lands. They iffued cam geft san W. Transform Impointable mercel othis

this paper currency to fatisfy in the first instance chiefly the demands made upon them by the Bank of discount, the great machine, or paper-mill, of their fictitious wealth.

The spoil of the church was now become the only resource of all their operations in finance; the vital principle of all their politics; the fole fecurity for the existence of their power. It was necessary by all, even the most violent means, to put every individual on the fame bottom, and to bind the nation in one guilty interest to uphold this act, and the authority of those by whom it was done. In order to force the most reluctant into a participation of their pillage, they rendered their paper circulation compulfory in all payments. Those who consider the general tendency of their schemes to this one object as a centre; and a centre from which afterwards all their meafures radiate, will not think that I dwell too long upon this part of the proceedings of the national affembly.

To cut off all appearance of connection between the crown and public justice, and to bring the whole under implicit obedience to the dictators in Paris, the old independent judicature of the parliaments, with all its merits, and all its faults, was wholly abolished. Whilst the parliaments existed, it was evident that the people might some time or other come to refort to them, and rally under the standard of their antient laws. It became however a matter of consideration that the magistrates and officers, in the courts now abolished, had purchased their places at a very high rate, for which, as well as for the duty they performed, they received but a very low return of interest. Simple confiscation is a boon only for the clergy; - to the lawyers some appearances of equity are to be observed; and they are to receive compensation to an immense amount. Their compenfation becomes part of the national debt, for the liquidation of which there is the one exhauftless fund. The lawyers are to obtain their compensation in the new church paper, which is to march with the new principles of judicature and legislature. The difmissed magistrates are to take their share of martyrdom with the ecclefiaftics, or to receive their own property from fuch a fund and in fuch a manner, as all those, who have been seasoned with the antient principles of jurisprudence, and had been the fworn guardians of property, must look upon with horror. Even the clergy are to receive their miserable allowance out of the depreciated paper which is stamped with the indelible character of facrilege, and with the fymbols of their own ruin, or they must starve. So violent an outrage upon credit, property, and liberty, as this compulsory paper currency, has feldom been exhibited by the alliance of bankruptcy and tyranny, at any time, or in any nation.

In the course of all these operations, at length comes out the grand arcanum;—that in reality, and in a fair sense, the lands of the church (so far as any thing certain can be gathered from their proceedings) are not to be fold at all. By the late resolutions of the national assembly, they are indeed to be delivered to the highest bidder. But it is to be observed, that a certain portion only of the purchase money is to be laid down. A period of twelve years is to be given for the payment of the rest. The philosophic purchasers are therefore, on payment of a fort of fine, to be put instantly into possession of the estate. It becomes in some respects a fort of gift to them; to be held on the feudal tenure of zeal to the new establishment. This project is evidently to let in a body of purchasers without money. The confequence will be, that these purchasers, or other grantees, will pay, not only from the rents as they accrue, which might as well be received by the state, but from the spoil of the materials of buildings, from wafte in woods, and from whatever money, by hands habituated to the gripings of usury, they can wring from the miserable peafant. He is to be delivered over to the mercenary and arbitrary discretion of men, who will be flimulated to every species of extortion by the growing demands on the growing profits of an estate held under the precarious settlement of a new political fyftem.

When all the frauds, impostures, violences, rapines, burnings, murders, confiscations, compulfory paper currencies, and every description of tyranny and cruelty employed to bring about and to uphold this revolution, have their natural effect, that is, to shock the moral sentiments of all virtuous and sober minds, the abettors of this philosophic system immediately strain their throats in a declamation against the old monarchical government of France. When they have rendered that deposed power sufficiently black,

they then proceed in argument, as if all those who disapprove of their new abuses, must of course be partizans of the old; that those who reprobate their crude and violent schemes of liberty ought to be treated as advocates for fervitude. I admit that their necessities do compel them to this base and contemptible fraud. Nothing can reconcile men to their proceedings and projects but the fupposition that there is no third option between them, and fome tyranny as odious as can be furnished by the records of history, or by the invention of poets. This prattling of theirs hardly deferves the name of fophistry. It is nothing but plain impudence. Have these gentlemen never heard, in the whole circle of the worlds of theory and practice, of any thing between the despotism of the monarch and the despotism of the multitude? Have they never heard of a monarchy directed by laws, controlled and balanced by the great hereditary wealth and hereditary dignity of a nation; and both again controlled by a judicious check from the reason and feeling of the people at large acting by a fuitable and permanent organ? Is it then impossible that a man may be found who, without criminal ill intention, or pitiable abfurdity, shall prefer such a mixed and tempered government to either of the extremes; and who may repute that nation to be destitute of all wisdom and of all virtue, which, having in its choice to obtain fuch a government with ease, or rather to confirm it when actually possessed, thought proper to commit a thousand crimes, and to subject their country to a thousand evils, in order to avoid it? Is it then a truth so universally acknowledged, that a pure democracy is the only tolerable form into which human society can be thrown, that a man is not permitted to hesitate about its merits, without the suspicion of being a friend to tyranny, that is, of being a foe to mankind?

I do not know under what description to class the present ruling authority in France. It affects to be a pure democracy, though I think it in a direct train of becoming shortly a mischievous and ignoble oligarchy. But for the present I admit it to be a contrivance of the nature and effect of what it pretends to. I reprobate no form of government merely upon abstract principles. There may be fituations in which the purely democratic form will become necessary. There may be some (very few, and very particularly circumstanced) where it would be clearly defireable. This I do not take to be the case of France, or of any other great country. Until now, we have feen no examples of confiderable democracies. The antients were better acquainted with them. Not being wholly unread in the authors, who had feen the most of those constitutions, and who best understood them, I cannot help concurring with their opinion, that an absolute democracy, no more than abfolute monarchy, is to be reckoned among the legitimate forms of government. They think it rather the corruption and degeneracy, than the found constitution of a republic. If I recollect rightly, Aristotle observes, that a democracy has many striking points of refemblance with a tyranny*. Of this I am certain, that in a democracy, the majority of the citizens is capable of exercifing the most cruel oppressions upon the minority, whenever ftrong divisions prevail in that kind of polity, as they often must; and that oppression of the minority will extend to far greater numbers, and will be carried on with much greater fury, than can almost ever be apprehended from the dominion of a fingle sceptre. fuch a popular perfecution, individual fufferers are in a much more deplorable condition than in any other. Under a cruel prince they have the balmy compassion of mankind to assuage the smart of their wounds; they have the plaudits of the people to animate their generous constancy under their sufferings: but those who are subjected to wrong under multitudes, are deprived of all external confola-

• When I wrote this I quoted from memory, after many years had elapsed from my reading the passage. A learned friend has found it, and it is as follows:

Το ήθ το αύτο, καὶ ἄμφω δεσποτικὰ τῶν βελτιόνων, καὶ τὰ Ψηρίσματα, ὦσπες ἐκεῖ τὰ ἐπιταγμαία· καὶ ο δημαγωγ καὶ ο κόλαζ, οἱ ἀυτοὶ καὶ ἀνάλογον· καὶ μάλισα ἐκάτεςοι πας ἐκατέροις ἐσχύκσιν, οἱ μὲν κόλακες παςὰ τυςάννοις, οἱ δὲ δημαγωγοὶ παςὰ τοῖς δήμοις τοῖς τοιέτοις.

The ethical character is the same; both exercise despotism over the better class of citizens; and decrees are in the one, what ordinances and arrêts are in the other: the demagogue too, and the court favourite, are not unfrequently the same identical men, and always bear a close analogy; and these have the principal power, each in their respective forms of government, savourites with the absolute monarch, and demagogues with a people such as I have described. Arist,

Politic. lib. iv. cap. 4.

tion. They feem deferted by mankind; overpowered by a conspiracy of their whole species.

But admitting democracy not to have that inevitable tendency to party tyranny, which I fuppose it to have, and admitting it to possess as much good in it when unmixed, as I am fure it poffesses when compounded with other forms; does monarchy, on its part, contain nothing at all to recommend it? I do not often quote Bolingbroke, nor have his works in general, left any permanent impression on my mind. He is a prefumptuous and a superficial writer. But he has one observation, which, in my opinion, is not without depth and folidity. He fays, that he prefers a monarchy to other governments; because you can better ingraft any description of republic on a monarchy than any thing of monarchy upon the republican forms. I think him perfectly in the right. The fact is fo historically; and it agrees well with the speculation.

I know how eafy a topic it is to dwell on the faults of departed greatness. By a revolution in the state, the fawning sycophant of yesterday, is converted into the austere critic of the present hour. But steady independant minds, when they have an object of so ferious a concern to mankind as government, under their contemplation, will disdain to assume the part of satirists and declaimers. They will judge of human institutions as they do of human characters. They will fort out the good from the evil, which is mixed in mortal institutions as it is in mortal men.

Your government in France, though usually, and I think justly, reputed the best of the unqualified

or ill-qualified monarchies, was still full of abuses. These abuses accumulated in a length of time, as they must accumulate in every monarchy not under the constant inspection of a popular representative. I am no stranger to the faults and defects of the fubverted government of France; and I think I am not inclined by nature or policy to make a panegyric upon any thing which is a just and natural object of censure. But the question is not now of the vices of that monarchy, but of its existence. Is it then true, that the French government was such as to be incapable or undeferving of reform; fo that it was of abfolute necessity the whole fabric should be at once pulled down, and the area cleared for the erection of a theoretic experimental edifice in its place? All France was of a different opinion in the beginning of the year 1789. The instructions to the representatives to the states-general, from every district in that kingdom, were filled with projects for the reformation of that government, without the remotest suggestion of a design to destroy it. Had such a design been then even infinuated, I believe there would have been but one voice, and that voice for rejecting it with fcorn and horror. Men have been fometimes led by degrees, fometimes hurried into things, the whole of which. if they could have feen together, they never would have permitted the most remote approach. When those instructions were given, there was no queftion but that abuses existed, and that they demanded a reform; nor is there now. In the interval between the instructions and the revolution, things changed their shape; and in consequence of that change, the true question at present is, ·Whether

Whether those who would have reformed, or those who have destroyed, are in the right?

To hear fome men fpeak of the late monarchy of France, you would imagine that they were talking of Persia bleeding under the ferocious sword of Tæhmas Kouli Khân; or at least describing the barbarous anarchic despotism of Turkey, where the finest countries in the most genial climates in the world are wasted by peace more than any countries have been worried by war; where arts are unknown, where manufactures languish, where fcience is extinguished, where agriculture decays, where the human race itself melts away and perishes under the eye of the observer. Was this the case of France? I have no way of determining the question but by a reference to facts. Facts do not support this resemblance. Along with much evil, there is some good in monarchy itself; and fome corrective to its evil, from religion, from laws, from manners, from opinions, the French monarchy must have received; which rendered it (though by no means a free, and therefore by no means a good conflitution) a despotism rather in appearance than in reality.

Among the standards upon which the effects of government on any country are to be estimated, I must consider the state of its population as not the least certain. No country in which population shourishes, and is in progressive improvement, can be under a very mischievous government. About sixty years ago, the Intendants of the generalities of France made, with other matters, a report of the population of their several districts. I have not

not the books, which are very voluminous, by me. nor do I know where to procure them (I am obliged to speak by memory, and therefore the less positively) but I think the population of France was by them, even at that period, estimated at twenty-two millions of fouls. At the end of the last century it had been generally calculated at eighteen. On either of these estimations France was not ill-peopled. Mr. Necker, who is an authority for his own time at least equal to the Intendants for theirs, reckons, and upon apparently fure principles, the people of France, in the year 1780, at twenty-four millions fix hundred and feventy thousand. But was this the probable ultimate term under the old establishment? Dr. Price is of opinion, that the growth of population in France was by no means at its acme in that year. I certainly defer to Dr. Price's authority a good deal more in these speculations, than I do in his general politics. This gentleman, taking ground on Mr. Necker's data, is very confident, that fince the period of that minister's calculation, the French population has encreased rapidly; fo rapidly that in the year 1789 he will not confent to rate the people of that kingdom at a lower number than thirty millions. After abating much (and much I think ought to be abated) from the fanguine calculation of Dr. Price, I have no doubt that the population of France did encrease confiderably during this later period: but supposing that it encreased to nothing more than will be fufficient to compleat the 24,670,000 to 25.millions, still a population of 25 millions, and that in an encreasing progress, on a space of about twenty-seven thousand square leagues, is immense. It is, for instance, a good deal more than the proportionable population of this island, or even than that of England, the best-peopled part of the united kingdom.

It is not univerfally true, that France is a fertile country. Confiderable tracts of it are barren, and labour under other natural disadvantages. In the portions of that territory, where things are more favourable, as far as I am able to discover, the numbers of the people correspond to the indulgence of nature *. The Generality of Liste (this I admit is the strongest example) upon an extent of 404 ½ leagues, about ten years ago, contained 734,600 souls, which is 1772 inhabitants to each square league. The middle term for the rest of France is about 900 inhabitants to the same admeasurement.

I do not attribute this population to the deposed government; because I do not like to compliment the contrivances of men, with what is due in a great degree to the bounty of Providence. But that decried government could not have obstructed, most probably it favoured, the operation of those causes (whatever they were) whether of nature in the soil, or in habits of industry among the people, which has produced so large a number of the species throughout that whole kingdom, and exhibited in some particular places such prodigies of population. I never will suppose that fabrick of a state to be the worst of all political institutions, which, by experience, is found to contain a principle savourable (however latent it may be) to the encrease of mankind.

The wealth of a country is another, and no contemptible standard, by which we may judge whether, on the whole, a government be protecting or destructive. France far exceeds England in the multitude of her people; but I apprehend that her comparative wealth is much inferior to ours; that it is not so equal in the diftribution, nor fo ready in the circulation. I believe the difference in the form of the two governments to be amongst the causes of this advantage on the fide of England. I speak of England, not of the whole British dominions; which, if compared with those of France, will, in some degree, weaken the comparative rate of wealth upon our fide. But that wealth, which will not endure a comparison with the riches of England, may constitute a very respectable degree of opulence. Mr. Necker's book published in 1785*, contains an accurate and interesting collection of facts relative to public œconomy and to political arithmetic; and his speculations on the subject are general wife and liberal. In that work he gives an idea of the state of France, very remote from the portrait of a country whose government was a perfect grievance, an absolute evil, admitting no cure but through the violent and uncertain remedy of a total revolution.

^{*} De l'Administration des Finances de la France, par-M. Necker.

He affirms, that from the year 1726 to the year 1784, there was coined at the mint of France, in the species of gold and silver, to the amount of about one hundred millions of pounds sterling *.

It is impossible that Mr. Necker should be mistaken in the amount of the bullion which has been coined in the mint. It is a matter of official record. The reasonings of this able financier, concerning the quantity of gold and filver which remained for circulation, when he wrote in 1785, that is about four years before the deposition and imprisonment of the French King, are not of equal certainty; but they are laid on grounds fo apparently folid, that it is not easy to refuse a considerable degree of affent to his calculation. He calculates the numeraire, or what we call Specie, then actually existing in France, at about eighty-eight millions of the fame English money. A great accumulation of wealth for one country, large as that country is! Mr. Necker was so far from considering this influx of wealth as likely to cease, when he wrote in 1785, that he prefumes upon a future annual increase of two per cent, upon the money brought into France during the periods from which he computed.

Some adequate cause must have originally introduced all the money coined at its mint into that kingdom; and some cause as operative must have kept at home, or returned into its bosom, such a vast slood of treasure as Mr. Necker calculates to remain for domestic circulation. Suppose any reasonable deductions from M. Necker's computation: the remainder must still amount to an immense sum. Causes thus powerful to acquire and to retain, cannot be found in discouraged industry, insecure property, and a positively destructive government. Indeed, when I consider the face of the kingdom of France; the multitude and opulence of her cities; the ufeful magnificence of her fpacious high roads and bridges; the opportunity of her artificial canals and navigations opening the conveniences of maritime communication through a folid continent of fo immenfe an extent; when I turn my eyes to the stupendous works of her ports and harbours, and to her whole naval apparatus, whether for war or trade; when I bring before my view the number of her fortifications, conftructed with fo bold and mafterly a skill, and made and maintained at so prodigious a charge, presenting an armed front and impenetrable barrier to her enemies upon every fide; when I recollect how very finall a part of that extensive region is without cultivation, and to what complete perfection the culture of many of the best productions of the earth have been brought in France; when I reflect on the excellence of her manufactures and fabrics, fecond to none but ours, and in fome particulars not fecond; when I contemplate the grand foundations of charity, public and private; when I furvey the state of all the arts that beautify and polish life; when I reckon the men she has bred for extending her fame in war, her able statesmen, the multitude of her profound lawyers and theologians, her philosophers, her critics, her historians and antiquaries, her poets, and her orators facred facred and profane, I behold in all this fomething which awes and commands the imagination, which checks the mind on the brink of precipitate and indifcriminate censure, and which demands, that we should very feriously examine, what and how great are the latent vices that could authorife us at once to level fo spacious a fabric with the ground. I do not recognize, in this view of things, the despotism of Turkey. Nor do I discern the character of a government, that has been, on the whole, fo oppressive, or so corrupt, or so negligent, as to be utterly unfit for all reformation. I must think such a government well deserved to have its excellencies heightened; its faults corrected; and its capacities improved into a British constitution.

Whoever has examined into the proceedings of that deposed government for several years back, cannot fail to have observed, amidst the inconstancy and fluctuation natural to courts, an earnest endeavour towards the prosperity and improvement of the country; he must admit, that it had long been employed, in some instances, wholly to remove, in many confiderably to correct, the abufive practices and usages that had prevailed in the state; and that even the unlimited power of the fovereign over the perfons of his subjects, inconfiftent, as undoubtedly it was, with law and liberty, had yet been every day growing more mitigated in the exercise. So far from refusing itself to reformation, that government was open, with a censurable degree of facility, to all forts of projects and projectors on the subject. Rather too much countenance was given to the spirit of innovation, which foon was turned against those who fostered it, and ended in their ruin. It is but cold, and no very flattering justice to that fallen monarchy, to fay, that, for many years, it trespassed more by levity and want of judgment in feveral of its schemes, than from any defect in diligence or in public spirit. To compare the government of France for the last fifteen or fixteen years with wife and well-constituted establishments, during that, or during any period, is not to act with fairness. But if in point of prodigality in the expenditure of money, or in point of rigour in the exercise of power, it be compared with any of the former reigns, I believe candid judges will give little credit to the good intentions of those who dwell perpetually on the donations to favourites, or on the expences of the court, or on the horrors of the Bastile in the reign of Louis the XVIth *.

Whether the system, if it deserves such a name, now built on the ruins of that antient monarchy, will be able to give a better account of the population and wealth of the country, which it has taken under its care, is a matter very doubtful. Instead of improving by the change, I apprehend that a long series of years must be told before it can recover in any degree the effects of this philosophic revolution, and before the nation can be replaced on its former footing. If Dr. Price should think fit,

The world is obliged to Mr. de Calonne for the pains he has taken to refute the fcandalous exaggerations relative to some of the royal expences, and to detect the fallacious account given of pensions, for the wicked purpose of provoking the populace to all forts of crimes.

a few years hence, to favour us with an estimate of the population of France, he will hardly be able to make up his tale of thirty millions of souls, as computed in 1789, or the assembly's computation of twenty-six millions of that year; or even Mr. Necker's twenty-sive millions in 1780. I hear that there are considerable emigrations from France; and that many quitting that voluptuous climate, and that seductive Circean liberty, have taken refuge in the frozen regions, and under the British despotism, of Canada.

In the present disappearance of coin, no perfon could think it the same country, in which the present minister of the sinances has been able to discover sourscore millions sterling in specie. From its general aspect one would conclude that it had been for some time past under the special direction of the learned academicians of Laputa and Balnibarbi*. Already the population of Paris has so declined, that Mr. Necker stated to the national assembly the provision to be made for its subsistence at a fifth less than what had formerly been sound requisite+. It is said (and I have never heard it contradicted) that an hundred thousand people are out of employment in that city, though it is become the seat of the imprisoned court and

cle of mendicancy displayed in that capital. Indeed, the votes of the national affembly leave no doubt of the fact. They have lately appointed a standing committee of mendicancy. They are contriving at once a vigorous police on this subject, and, for the first time, the imposition of a tax to maintain the poor, for whose present relief great sums appear on the face of the public accounts of the year*. In the mean time, the leaders of the legislative clubs and coffee-houses are intoxicated with admiration at their own wisdom and ability. They speak with the most sovereign contempt of the rest of the world. They tell the people, to com-

When I fent this book to the press I entertained some doubt concerning the nature and extent of the last article in the above accounts, which is only under a general head, without any detail. Since then I have feen M. de Calonne's work. I must think it a great loss to me that I had not that advantage earlier. M. de Calonne thinks this article to be on account of general subfiftence: but as he is not able to comprehend how fo great a lofs as upwards of f. 1,661,000 sterling could be fuftained on the difference between the price and the fale of grain, he feems to attribute this enormous head of charge to fecret expences of the revolution. I cannot fay any thing pofitively on that subject; but the reader is capable of judging, by the aggregate of these immense charges, on the state and condition of France, and their fystem of publick economy. These articles produced no enquiry or discussion in the National Assembly. fort fort them in the rags with which they have cloathed them, that they are a nation of philosophers: and, fometimes, by all the arts of quackish parade, by shew, tumult, and bustle, sometimes by the alarms of plots and invasions, they attempt to drown the cries of indigence, and to divert the eyes of the observer from the ruin and wretchedness of the state. A brave people will certainly prefer liberty, accompanied with a virtuous poverty, to a depraved and wealthy fervitude. But before the price of comfort and opulence is paid, one ought to be pretty fure it is real liberty which is purchased, and that she is to be purchased at no other price. I shall always, however, consider that liberty as very equivocal in her appearance, which has not wisdom and justice for her companions; and does not lead prosperity and plenty in her train.

The advocates for this revolution, not fatisfied with exaggerating the vices of their antient government, strike at the fame of their country itself, by painting almost all that could have attracted the attention of strangers, I mean their nobility and their clergy, as objects of horror. If this were only a libel, there had not been much in it. But it has practical consequences. Had your nobility and gentry, who formed the great body of your landed men, and the whole of your military officers, refembled those of Germany, at the period when the Hanfe-towns were necessitated to confederate against the nobles in defence of their property-had they been like the Orfini and Vitelli in Italy, who used to fally from their fortified dens to rob the trader and traveller-had they been such as the Mamalukes in Egypt, or the Nayrs on the coast of Malabar, I do admit, that too critical an enquiry might not be adviseable into the means of freeing the world from such a nuisance. The statues of Equity and Mercy might be veiled for a moment. The tenderest minds, confounded with the dreadful exigence in which morality submits to the suspension of its own rules in favour of its own principles, might turn aside whilst fraud and violence were accomplishing the destruction of a pretended nobility which disgraced whilst it persecuted human nature. The persons most abhorrent from blood, and treason, and arbitrary confiscation, might remain silent spectators of this civil war between the vices.

But did the privileged nobility who met under the king's precept at Versailles, in 1789, or their constituents, deserve to be looked on as the Nayres or Mamalukes of this age, or as the Orfini and Vitella of ancient times? If I had then asked the question, I should have passed for a madman. What have they fince done that they were to be driven into exile, that their perfons should be hunted about, mangled, and tortured, their families dispersed, their houses laid in ashes, that their order should be abolished, and the memory of it, if possible, extinguished, by ordaining them to change the very names by which they were usually known? Read their instructions to their representatives. They breathe the spirit of liberty as warmly, and they recommend reformation as ftrongly, as any other order. Their privileges relative to contribution were voluntarily furrendered; as the king, from from the beginning, surrendered all pretence to a right of taxation. Upon a free constitution there was but one opinion in France. The absolute monarchy was at an end. It breathed its last, without a groan, without struggle, without convulsion. All the struggle, all the dissension arose afterwards upon the preference of a despotic democracy to a government of reciprocal controul. The triumph of the victorious party was over the principles of a British constitution.

I have observed the affectation, which, for many years past, has prevailed in Paris even to a degree perfectly childish, of idolizing the memory of your Henry the Fourth. If any thing could put one out of humour with that ornament to the kingly character, it would be this overdone style of infidious panegyric. The perfons who have worked this engine the most bushiy, are those who have ended their panegyrics in dethroning his fucceffor and descendant; a man, as good-natured at the least, as Henry the Fourth; altogether as fond of his people; and who has done infinitely more to correct the antient vices of the state than that great monarch did, or we are fure he ever meant to do. Well it is for his panegyrifts that they have not him to deal with. For Henry of Navarre was a resolute, active, and politic prince. He possessed indeed great humanity and mildness; but an humanity and mildness that never stood in the way of his interests. He never fought to be loved without putting himfelf first in a condition to be feared. He used soft language with determined conduct. He afferted and maintained his authority in the gross, and distributed his acts of concession only in the detail. He spent the income of his prerogatives nobly; but he took care not to break in upon the capital; never abandoning for a moment any of the claims, which he made under the fundamental laws, nor sparing to shed the blood of those who opposed him, often in the field, sometimes upon the scassfold. Because he knew how to make his virtues respected by the ungrateful, he has merited the praises of those whom, if they had lived in his time, he would have shut up in the Bastile, and brought to punishment along with the regicides whom he hanged after he had famished Paris into a surrender.

If these panegyrists are in earnest in their admiration of Henry the Fourth, they must remember, that they cannot think more highly of him, than he did of the noblesse of France; whose virtue, honour, courage, patriotism, and loyalty were his constant theme.

But the nobility of France are degenerated fince the days of Henry the Fourth.—This is possible. But it is more than I can believe to be true in any great degree. I do not pretend to know France as correctly as some others; but I have endeavoured through my whole life to make myself acquainted with human nature: otherwise I should be unsit to take even my humble part in the service of mankind. In that study I could not pass by a vast portion of our nature, as it appeared modified in a country but twenty-four miles from the shore of this island. On my best observation, compared with my best enquiries, I found your nobility for the

the greater part composed of men of an high spirit, and of a delicate sense of honour, both with regard to themselves individually, and with regard to their whole corps, over whom they kept, beyond what is common in other countries, a censorial eye. They were tolerably well-bred; very officious, humane, and hospitable; in their conversation frank and open; with a good military tone; and reasonably tinctured with literature, particularly of the authors in their own language. Many had pretensions far above this description. I speak of those who were generally met with.

As to their behaviour to the inferior classes. they appeared to me to comport themselves towards them with good-nature, and with fomething more nearly approaching to familiarity, than is generally practifed with us in the intercourse between the higher and lower ranks of life. To ftrike any person, even in the most abject condition, was a thing in a manner unknown, and would be highly disgraceful. Instances of other ill-treatment of the humble part of the community were rare; and as to attacks made upon the property or the perfonal liberty of the commons, I never heard of any whatfoever from them; nor, whilft the laws were in vigour under the ancient government, would fuch tyranny in subjects have been permitted. As men of landed effaces, I had no fault to find with their conduct, though much to reprehend, and much to wish changed, in many of the old tenures. Where the letting of their land was by rent, I could not discover that their agreements with their farmers were oppressive; nor when they were in partnership partnership wirh the farmer, as often was the case, have I heard that they had taken the lion's share. The proportions seemed not inequitable. There might be exceptions; but certainly they were exceptions only. I have no reason to believe that in these respects the landed noblesse of France were worse than the landed gentry of this country; certainly in no respect more vexatious than the landholders, not noble, of their own nation. In cities the nobility had no manner of power; in the country very little. You know, Sir, that much of the civil government, and the police in the most effential parts, was not in the hands of that nobility which prefents itself first to our consideration. The revenue, the fystem and collection of which were the most grievous parts of the French government, was not administered by the men of the sword; nor were they answerable for the vices of its principle, or the vexations, where any fuch existed, in its management.

Denying, as I am well warranted to do, that the nobility had any confiderable share in the oppression of the people, in cases in which real oppression existed, I am ready to admit that they were not without considerable faults and errors. A foolish imitation of the worst part of the manners of England, which impaired their natural character without substituting in its place what perhaps they meant to copy, has certainly rendered them worse than formerly they were. Habitual dissoluteness of manners continued beyond the pardonable period of life, was more common amongst them than it is with us; and it reigned with the less hope hope of remedy, though possibly with something of less mischies, by being covered with more exterior decorum. They countenanced too much that licentious philosophy which has helped to bring on their ruin. There was another error amongst them more satal. Those of the commons, who approached to or exceeded many of the nobility in point of wealth, were not fully admitted to the rank and estimation which wealth, in reason and good policy, ought to bestow in every country; though I think not equally with that of other nobility. The two kinds of aristocracy were too punctiliously kept asunder; less so, however, than in Germany and some other nations.

This feparation, as I have already taken the liberty of suggesting to you, I conceive to be one principal cause of the destruction of the old nobility. The military, particularly, was too exclusively reserved for men of family. But after all, this was an error of opinion, which a consticting opinion would have rectified. A permanent assembly, in which the commons had their share of power, would soon abolish whatever was too invidious and insulting in these distinctions; and even the faults in the morals of the nobility would have been probably corrected by the greater varities of occupation and pursuit to which a constitution by orders would have given rise.

All this violent cry against the nobility I take to be a mere work of art. To be honoured and even privileged by the laws, opinions, and inveterate usages of our country, growing out of the prejudice of ages, has nothing to provoke horror and indignation in any man. Even to be too tenacious of those privileges, is not absolutely a crime. The strong struggle in every individual to preserve possession of what he has found to belong to him and to diftinguish him, is one of the fecurities against injustice and despotism implanted in our nature. It operates as an instinct to secure property, and to preserve communities in a settled Rate. What is there to shock in this? Nobility is a graceful ornament to the civil order. It is the Corinthian capital of polished society. Omnes boni nobilitati semper favemus, was the faying of a wife and good man. It is indeed one fign of a liberal and benevolent mind to incline to it with fome fort of partial propenfity. He feels no ennobling principle in his own heart who wishes to level all the artificial institutions which have been adopted for giving a body to opinion, and permanence to fugitive esteem. It is a four, malignant, envious disposition, without taste for the reality, or for any image or representation of virtue, that fees with joy the unmerited fall of what had long flourished in splendour and in honour. I do not like to fee any thing deffroyed; any void produced in fociety; any ruin on the face of the land. It was therefore with no difappointment or diffatisfaction that my enquiries and observation did not present to me any incorrigible vices in the noblesse of France, or any abuse which

which could not be removed by a reform very short of abolition. Your noblesse did not deserve punishment; but to degrade is to punish.

It was with the same satisfaction I found that the refult of my enquiry concerning your clergy was not distimilar. It is no foothing news to my ears, that great bodies of men are incurably corrupt. It is not with much credulity I listen to any, when they speak evil of those whom they are going to plunder. I rather suspect that vices are feigned or exaggerated, when profit is looked for in their punishment. An enemy is a bad witness: a robber is a worse. Vices and abuses there were undoubtedly in that order, and must be. It was an old establishment, and not frequently revised. But I saw no crimes in the. individuals that merited confiscation of their fubstance, nor those cruel insults and degradations, and that unnatural perfecution which have been substituted in the place of meliorating regulation.

If there had been any just cause for this new religious persecution, the atheistic libellers, who act as trumpeters to animate the populace to plunder, do not love any body so much as not to dwell with complacence on the vices of the existing clergy. This they have not done. They find themselves obliged to rake into the histories of former ages (which they have ransacked with a malignant and profligate industry) for every instance of oppression and persecution which has been made by that body or in its favour, in order to justify, upon very iniquitous, because very illogical principles of retaliation, their own perfecutions, and their own cruelties. After destroying all other genealogies and family distinctions, they invent a fort of pedigree of crimes. It is not very just to chastise men for the offences of their natural ancestors; but to take the fiction of ancestry in a corporate succession, as a ground for punishing men who have no relation to guilty acts, except in names and general descriptions, is a fort of refinement in injustice belonging to the philosophy of this enlightened age. The affembly punishes men, many, if not most, of whom abhor the violent conduct of ecclefiaftics in former times as much as their present persecutors can do. and who would be as loud and as ftrong in the expression of that sense, if they were not well aware of the purpofes for which all this declamamation is employed.

Corporate bodies are immortal for the good of the members, but not for their punishment. Nations themselves are such corporations. As well might we in England think of waging inexpiable war upon all Frenchmen for the evils which they have brought upon us in the several periods of our mutual hostilities. You might, on your part, think yourselves justified in falling upon all Englishmen on account of the unparalleled calamities brought upon the people of France by the unjust invasions of our Henries and our Edwards. Indeed we should be mutually justified in this exterminatory war upon each other, full as much as you are in the unprovoked perfecution of your prefent countrymen, on account of the conduct of men of the fame name in other times.

We do not draw the moral lessons we might from history. On the contrary, without care it may be used to vitiate our minds and to destroy our happiness. In history a great volume is unrolled for our instruction, drawing the materials of future wifdom from the past errors and infirmities of mankind. It may, in the perversion, serve for a magazine, furnishing offensive and defensive weapons for parties in church and flate, and supplying the means of keeping alive, or reviving diffentions and animofities, and adding fuel to civil fury. Hifrory consists, for the greater part, of the miseries brought upon the world by pride, ambition, avarice, revenge, luft, fedition, hypocrify, ungoverned zeal, and all the train of diforderly appetites, which shake the public with the same

"The private state, and render life unsweet."

These vices are the causes of those storms. Religion, morals, laws, prerogatives, privileges, liberties, rights of men, are the pretexts. The pretexts are always found in some specious appearance of a real good. You would not secure men from tyranny and sedition, by rooting out of the mind the principles to which these fraudulent pretexts apply? If you did, you would root out every thing that is valuable in the human breast. As these are the pretexts, so the ordinary actors and instruments in great public evils are kings, priests, magistrates, magistrates, senates, parliaments, national assemblies, judges, and captains. You would not cure the evil by refolving, that there should be no more monarchs, nor ministers of state, nor of the gospel; no interpreters of law; no general. officers; no public councils. You might change the names. The things in some shape must remain. A certain quantum of power must always exist in the community, in some hands, and under some appellation. Wife men will apply their remedies to vices, not to names; to the causes of evil which are permanent, not to the occasional organs by which they act, and the transitory modes in which they appear. Otherwise you will be wife historically, a fool in practice. Seldom have two ages the fame fashion in their pretexts and the fame modes of mischief. Wickedness is a little more inventive. Whilst you are discussing fashion, the fashion is gone by. The very same vice asfumes a new body. The spirit transmigrates; and, far from losing its principle of life by the change of its appearance, it is renovated in its new organs with the fresh vigour of a juvenile activity. It walks abroad; it continues its ravages; whilst you are gibbeting the carcais, or demolishing the tomb. You are terrifying yourfelf with ghosts and apparitions, whilst your house is the haunt of robbers. It is thus with all those, who, attending only to the shell and husk of history, think they are waging war with intolerance, pride, and cruelty, whilft, under colour of abhorring the ill principles of antiquated parties, they are authorizing and feeding the fame odious vices in different factions, and perhaps in worfe. Your

. Your citizens of Paris formerly had lent themfelves as the ready inftruments to flaughter the followers of Calvin, at the infamous massacre of St. Bartholomew. What should we say to those who could think of retaliating on the Parifians of this day the abominations and horrors of that time? They are indeed brought to abhor that massacre. Ferocious as they are, it is not difficult to make them diflike it; because the politicians and fashionable teachers have no interest in giving their passions exactly the same direction. Still however they find it their interest to keep the same savage dispositions alive. It was but the other day that they caused this very maffacre to be acted on the stage for the diverfion of the descendants of those who committed it. In this tragic farce they produced the cardinal of Lorraine in his robes of function, ordering general flaughter. Was this spectacle intended to make the Parifians abhor perfecution, and loath the effufion of blood?-No, it was to teach them to perfecute their own pastors; it was to excite them, by raifing a difgust and horror of their clergy, to an alacrity in hunting down to destruction an order, which, if it ought to exist at all, ought to exist not only in fafety, but in reverence. It was to stimulate their cannibal appetites (which one would think had been gorged fufficiently) by variety and feafoning; and to quicken them to an alertness in new murders and maffacres, if it should fuit the purpose of the Guises of the day. An affembly, in which fat a multitude of priefts and prelates, was obliged to fuffer this indignity at its door. The author was not fent to the gallies, nor the players to the house P 2 of. of correction. Not long after this exhibition, these players came forward to the affembly to claim the rites of that very religion which they had dared to expose, and to shew their prostituted faces in the senate, whilst the archbishop of Paris, whose function was known to his people only by his prayers and benedictions, and his wealth only by his alms, is forced to abandon his house, and to sly from his slock (as from ravenous wolves) because, truly, in the sixteenth century, the Cardinal of Lorraine was a rebel and a murderer.

Such is the effect of the perversion of history, by those, who, for the same nefarious purposes, have perverted every other part of learning. But those who will stand upon that elevation of reason, which places centuries under our eye, and brings things to the true point of comparison, which obfcures little names, and effaces the colours of little parties, and to which nothing can afcend but the ipirit and moral quality of human actions, will fay to the teachers of the Palais Royal,-the Cardinal of Lorraine was the murderer of the fixteenth century, you have the glory of being the murderers in the eighteenth; and this is the only difference between you. But hiftory, in the nineteenth century, better understood, and better employed, will, I truft, teach a civilized posterity to abhor the misdeeds of both these barbarous ages. It will teach future priefts and magistrates not to retaliate upon the speculative and inactive atheists of future times, the enormities committed by the present practical zealots and furious fanatics of that wretched error, which, in its quiescent state, is more than punished, whenever whenever it is embraced. It will teach posterity not to make war upon either religion or philosophy, for the abuse which the hypocrites of both have made of the two most valuable bleffings conferred upon us by the bounty of the universal Patron, who in all things eminently favours and protects the race of man.

If your clergy, or any clergy, should skew themfelves vicious beyond the fair bounds allowed to human infirmity, and to those professional faults which can hardly be feparated from professional virtues, though their vices never can countenance the exercise of oppression, I do admit, that they would naturally have the effect of abating very much of our indignation against the tyrants who exceed measure and justice in their punishment. I can allow in clergymen, through all their divisions, some tenaciousness of their own opinion; some overflowings of zeal for its propagation; some predilection to their own state and office; some attachment to the interest of their own corps; some preference to those who listen with docility to their doctrines, beyond those who scorn and deride them. I allow all this, because I am a man who have to deal with men, and who would not, through a violence of toleration, run into the greatest of all intolerance. I must bear with infirmities until they fester into crimes.

Undoubtedly, the natural progress of the pasfions, from frailty to vice ought to be prevented by a watchful eye and a firm hand. But is it true that the body of your clergy had past those limits of a just allowance? From the general style of your late publications of all forts, one would be led to believe that your clergy in France were a fort of monsters; an horrible composition of superstition, ignorance, floth, fraud, avarice, and tyranny. But is this true? Is it true, that the lapse of time, the ceffation of conflicting interests, the woful experience of the evils refulting from party rage, has had no fort of influence gradually to meliorate their minds? Is it true, that they were daily renewing invafions on the civil power, troubling the domestic quiet of their country, and rendering the operations of its government feeble and precarious? Is it true, that the clergy of our times have pressed down the laity with an iron hand, and were, in all places, lighting up the fires of a favage perfecution? Did they by every fraud endeavour to encrease their estates? Did they use to exceed the due demands on effates that were their own? Or, rigidly screwing up right into wrong, did they convert a legal claim into a vexatious extortion? When not possessed of power, were they filled with the vices of those who envy it? Were they enflamed with a violent litigious spirit of controverfy? Goaded on with the ambition of intellectual fovereignty, were they ready to fly in the face of all magistracy, to fire churches, to massacre the priefts of other descriptions, to pull down altars, and to make their way over the ruins of fubverted governments to an empire of doctrine, fometimes flattering, fometimes forcing the conseiences of men from the jurisdiction of public inflitutions. stitutions into a submission to their personal authority, beginning with a claim of liberty and ending with an abuse of power?

These, or some of these, were the vices objected, and not wholly without foundation, to several of the churchmen of former times, who belonged to the two great parties which then divided and distracted Europe.

If there was in France, as in other countries there visibly is, a great abatement, rather than any increase of these vices, instead of loading the present clergy with the crimes of other men, and the odious character of other times, in common equity they ought to be praised, encouraged, and supported, in their departure from a spirit which disgraced their predecessors, and for having assumed a temper of mind and manners more suitable to their facred function.

When my occasions took me into France, towards the close of the late reign, the clergy, under all their forms, engaged a confiderable part of my curiofity. So far from finding (except from one fet of men, not then very numerous though very active) the complaints and discontents against that body, which fome publications had given me reason to expect, I perceived little or no public or private uneafiness on their account. On further examination, I found the clergy in general, persons of moderate minds and decorous manners; I include the feculars, and the regulars of both fexes. I had not the good fortune to know a great many of the parochial clergy; but in general I received a perfectly good account of their PA

their morals, and of their attention to their duties. With some of the higher clergy I had a personal acquaintance; and of the rest in that class, very good means of information. They were, almost all of them, persons of noble birth. They resembled others of their own rank; and where there was any difference, it was in their favour. They were more fully educated than the military nobleffe; fo as by no means to difgrace their profession by ignorance, or by want of fitness for the exercise of their authority. They feemed to me, beyond the clerical character, liberal and open; with the hearts of gentlemen, and men of honour; neither infolent nor fervile in their manners and conduct. They feemed to me rather a fuperior class; a fet of men, amongst whom you would not be surprised to find a Fenelon. I faw among the clergy in Paris (many of the description are not to be met with any where) men of great learning and candour; and I had reason to believe, that this description was not confined to Paris. What I found in other places, I know was accidental; and therefore to be prefumed a fair fample. I spent a few days in a provincial town, where, in the absence of the bishop, I paffed my evenings with three clergymen, his vicars general, persons who would have done honour to any church. They were all well informed; two of them of deep, general, and extensive erudition, antient and modern, oriental and western; particularly in their own profession. They had a more extensive knowledge of our English divines than I expected; and they entered into the genius of those writers with a critical dead, the Abbé Morangis. I pay this tribute, without reluctance, to the memory of that noble, reverend, learned, and excellent person; and I should do the same, with equal cheerfulness, to the merits of the others, who I believe are still living, if I did not sear to hurt those whom I am unable to serve.

Some of these ecclesiastics of rank, are, by all titles, persons deserving of general respect. They are deferving of gratitude from me, and from many English. If this letter should ever come into their hands, I hope they will believe there are those of our nation who feel for their unmerited fall, and for the cruel confiscation of their fortunes. with no common fenfibility. What I fay of them is a testimony, as far as one feeble voice can go, which I owe to truth. Whenever the question of this unnatural perfecution is concerned, I will pay it. No one shall prevent me from being just and grateful. The time is fitted for the duty; and it is particularly becoming to fhew our justice and gratitude, when those who have deserved well of us and of mankind are labouring under popular obloguy and the perfecutions of oppressive power.

You had before your revolution about an hundred and twenty bishops. A few of them were men of eminent fanctity, and charity without limit. When we talk of the heroic, of course we talk of rare, virtue. I believe the instances of eminent depravity may be as rare amought them as those of transcendent goodness. Examples of avarice and of licentiousness may be picked out, I do not question it, by those who delight in the investigation which leads to such difcoveries. A man, as old as I am, will not be aftonished that feveral, in every description, do not lead that perfect life of felf-denial, with regard to wealth or to pleafure, which is wished for by all, by some expected, but by none exacted with more rigour, than by those who are the most attentive to their own interefts, or the most indulgent to their own passions. When I was in France, I am certain that the number of vicious prelates was not great. Certain individuals among them not distinguishable for the regularity of their lives, made fome amends for their want of the severe virtues, in their possession of the liberal; and were endowed with qualities which made them useful in the church and state. I am told, that with few exceptions, Louis the Sixteenth had been more attentive to character, in his promotions to that rank, than his immediate predeceffor; and I believe, (as some spirit of reform has prevailed through the whole reign) that it may be true. But the present ruling power has shewn a disposition only to plunder the church. It has punished all prelates; which is to favour the vicious, at least in point of reputation. It has made a degrading pensionary establishment, to which no man of liberal ideas or liberal condition will deftine his children. It must settle into the lowest classes of the people. As with you the inferior clergy are not numerous enough for their duties; as these duties are, beyond measure, minute and toilsome; as you have left no middle classes of clergy at their ease, in future nothing of science or erudition can exist in the Gallican church. To complete complete the project, without the least attention to the rights of patrons, the affembly has provided in future an elective clergy; an arrangement which will drive out of the clerical profession all men of fobriety; all who can pretend to independence in their function or their conduct; and which will throw the whole direction of the public mind into the hands of a fet of licentious, bold, crafty, factious, flattering wretches, of fuch condition and fuch habits of life as will make their contemptible penfions (in comparison of which the stipend of an excifeman is lucrative and honourable) an object of low and illiberal intrigue. Those officers, whom they still call bishops, are to be elected to a provision comparatively mean, through the fame arts, (that is, electioneering arts) by men of all religious tenets that are known or can be invented. The new lawgivers have not afcertained any thing whatfoever concerning their qualifications, relative either to doctrine or to morals; no more than they have done with regard to the fubordinate clergy; nor does it appear but that both the higher and the lower may, at their difcretion, practife or preach any mode of religion or irreligion that they please. I do not yet see what the jurisdiction of bishops over their subordinates is to be; or whether they are to have any jurisdiction at all.

In short, Sir, it seems to me, that this new ecclesiastical establishment is intended only to be temporary, and preparatory to the utter abolition, under any of its forms, of the Christian religion, whenever the minds of men are prepared for this last stroke against it, by the accomplishment of the plan for bringing its ministers into universal contempt. They who will not believe, that the philofophical fanatics who guide in these matters, have long entertained fuch a defign, are utterly ignorant of their character and proceedings. These enthusiafts do not fcruple to avow their opinion, that a ftate can fublift without any religion better than with one; and that they are able to fupply the place of any good which may be in it, by a project of their own -namely, by a fort of education they have imagined, founded in a knowledge of the physical wants of men; progreffively carried to an enlightened felfinterest, which, when well understood, they tell us will identify with an interest more enlarged and public. The scheme of this education has been long known. Of late they diftinguish it (as they have got an entire new nomenclature of technical terms) by the name of a Civic Education.

I hope their partizans in England, (to whom I rather attribute very inconfiderate conduct than the ultimate object in this deteftable defign) will fucceed neither in the pillage of the ecclefiaftics, nor in the introduction of a principle of popular election to our bishoprics and parochial cures. This, in the present condition of the world, would be the last corruption of the church; the utter ruin of the clerical character; the most dangerous shock that the state ever received through a misunder-stood arrangement of religion. I know well enough that the bishopricks and cures, under kingly and seignoral patronage, as now they are in England, and as they have been lately in France, are sometimes acquired by unworthy methods; but the other mode of ecclefiaftical canvas subjects them infinitely more furely and more generally to all the evil arts of low ambition, which, operating on and through greater numbers, will produce mischief in proportion.

Those of you who have robbed the clergy, think that they shall easily reconcile their conduct to all protestant nations; because the clergy, whom they have thus plundered, degraded, and given over to mockery and fcorn, are of the Roman Catholic, that is, of their own pretended perfuasion. I have no doubt that some miserable bigots will be found here as well as elfewhere, who hate fects and parties different from their own, more than they love the fubstance of religion; and who are more angry with those who differ from them in their particular plans and fystems, than displeased with those who attack the foundation of our common hope. These men will write and fpeak on the fubject in the manner that is to be expected from their temper and character. Burnet fays, that when he was in France, in the year 1683, " the method which carried over the men of the " finest parts to popery was this -- they brought " themselves to doubt of the whole Christian re-" ligion. When that was once done, it feemed a " more indifferent thing of what fide or form they " continued outwardly." If this was then the ecclefiaftic policy of France, it is what they have fince but too much reason to repent of. They preferred atheism to a form of religion not agreeable to their ideas. They fucceeded in destroying that form; and atheifm has succeeded in destroying them. I can readily give credit to Burnet's ftory;

story; because I have observed too much of a similar spirit (for a little of it is "much too much") amongst ourselves. The humour, however, is not general.

The teachers who reformed our religion in England bore no fort of refemblance to your prefent reforming doctors in Paris. Perhaps they were (like those whom they opposed) rather more than could be wished under the influence of a party spirit; but they were most fincere believers; men of the most fervent and exalted piety; ready to die (as fome of them did die) like true heroes in defence of their particular ideas of Christianity; as they would with equal fortitude, and more chearfully, for that flock of general truth, for the branches of which they contended with their blood. Thefe men would have difavowed with horror those wretches who claimed a fellowship with them upon no other titles than those of their having pillaged the persons with whom they maintained controversies, and their having despised the common religion, for the purity of which they exerted themfelves with a zeal, which unequivocally bespoke their highest reverence for the substance of that fystem which they wished to reform. Many of their descendants have retained the same zeal; but, (as less engaged in conslict) with more moderation. They do not forget that justice and mercy are fubstantial parts of religion. Impious men do not recommend themselves to their communion by iniquity and cruelty towards any description of their fellow creatures.

We hear these new teachers continually boasting of their spirit of toleration. That those persons should tolerate all opinions, who think none to be of estimation, is a matter of small merit. Equal neglect is not impartial kindness. The species of benevolence, which arises from contempt, is no true charity. There are in England abundance of men who tolerate in the true spirit of toleration. They think the dogmas of religion. though in different degrees, are all of moment: and that amongst them there is, as amongst all things of value, a just ground of preference. They favour, therefore, and they tolerate. They tolerate, not because they despise opinions, but because they respect justice. They would reverently and affectionately protect all religions, because they love and venerate the great principle upon which they all agree, and the great object to which they are all directed. They begin more and more plainly to difcern, that we have all a common cause, as against a common enemy. They will not be fo missed by the spirit of faction, as not to distinguish what is done in favour of their fubdivision, from those acts of hostility, which, through some particular description, are aimed at the whole corps, in which they themselves, under another denomination, are included. It is impossible for me to say what may be the character of every description of men amongst us. But I speak for the greater part; and for them, I must tell you, that sacrilege is no part of their doctrine of good works; that, fo far from calling you into their fellowship on fuch title, if your profesfors are admitted to their communion, they must carefully conceal their doctrine of the lawfulness of the proscription of innocent men and that they must make restitution of all stolen goods whatsoever. Till then they are none of ours.

You may suppose that we do not approve your confiscation of the revenues of bishops, and deans, and chapters, and parochial clergy possessing independent estates arising from land, because we have the same fort of establishment in England. That objection, you will fay, cannot hold as to the confication of the goods of monks and nuns, and the abolition of their order. It is true, that this particular part of your general confiscation does not affect England, as a precedent in point: but the reafon applies; and it goes a great way. The long parliament confiscated the lands of deans and chapters in England on the fame ideas upon which your affembly fet to fale the lands of the monastic orders. But it is in the principle of injustice that the danger lies, and not in the description of persons on whom it is first exercised. I see, in a country very near us, a course of policy pursued, which fets justice, the common concern of mankind, at defiance. With the national affembly of France, poffession is nothing; law and usage are nothing. I fee the national affembly openly reprobate the doctrine of prescription, which * one of the greatest of their own lawyers tells us, with great truth, is a part of the law of nature. He tells us, that the positive afcertainmennt of its limits, and its fecurity from invalion, were among the causes for which civil fociety itself has been instituted. If prescription be once shaken, no species of property is secure, when it once becomes an object large enough to tempt the cupidity of indigent power. I fee a practice perfeetly correspondent to their contempt of this great fundamental part of natural law. I fee the confifcators begin with bishops, and chapters, and monasteries; but I do not fee them end there. I fee the princes of the blood, who, by the oldest usages of that kingdom, held large landed eftates, (hardly with the compliment of a debate) deprived of their poffeffions, and in lieu of their stable independent property, reduced to the hope of some precarious, charitable pension, at the pleasure of an assembly, which of course will pay little regard to the rights of penfioners at pleafure, when it despifes those of legal proprietors. Flushed with the insolence of their first inglorious victories, and pressed by the diffresses caused by their lust of unhallowed lucre, disappointed but not discouraged, they have at length ventured completely to fubvert all property of all descriptions throughout the extent of a great kingdom. They have compelled all men, in all transactions of commerce, in the disposal of lands, in civil dealing, and through the whole communion of life, to accept as perfect payment and good and lawful tender, the fymbols of their speculations on a projected fale of their plunder. What veftiges of liberty or property have they left? The tenant-right of a cabbage-garden, a year's interest in a hovel, the good-will of an alehouse, or a baker's shop, the very shadow of a constructive property, are more ceremoniously treated in our parliament than with you the oldest and most valuable landed possesfions, in the hands of the most respectable perfonages, or than the whole body of the monied and commercial interest of your country. We entertain an high opinion of the legislative authority; but we have never dreamt that parliaments had any right whatever to violate property, to overrule prescription, or to force a currency of their own fiction in the place of that which is real, and recognized by the law of nations. But you, who began with refusing to submit to the most moderate restraints, have ended by establishing an unheard of despotism. I find the ground upon which your confiscators go is this; that indeed their proceedings could not be supported in a court of justice; but that the rules of prescription cannot bind a legislative assembly *. So that this legislative affembly of a free nation fits, not for the fecurity, but for the destruction of property, and not of property only, but of every rule and maxim which can give it stability, and of those instruments which can alone give it circulation.

When the Anabaptists of Munster, in the fixteenth century, had filled Germany with confusion by their fystem of levelling and their wild opinions concerning property, to what country in Europe did not the progress of their fury furnish just cause of alarm? We cannot be ignorant of the spirit of atheistical fanaticism, that is inspired by a multitude of writings, difperfed with incredible affiduity and expence, and by fermons delivered in all the streets and places of public refort in Paris. These writings and fermons have filled the populace with a black and favage atrocity of mind, which fuperfedes in them the common feelings of nature, as well as all fentiments of morality and religion; infomuch that these wretches are induced to bear with a fullen patience the intolerable diffresses brought upon them by the violent convulsions and permutations that have been made in property *? * Whether the following description is strictly true I know not; but it is what the publishers would have pass for true, in order to animate others. In a letter from Toul, given in one of their papers, is the following passage concerning the people of that district : " Dans la Révolution actuelle, ils ont rélifté à toutes les séductions du bigotifme, aux perse sécutions et aux tracasseries des Ennemis de la Révoluet tion. Oubliant leurs plus grands intérêts pour rendre hom-" mage aux vues d'ordre général qui ont determiné l'Af-" semblée Nationale, ils voient, sans se plaindre, supprimer " cette foule d'établissemens ecclésiastiques par lesquels ils " subsissaient; et même, en perdant leur siège épiscopal, la seule de toutes ces ressources qui pouvoit, ou plutôt qui devoit, en ce toute équité, leur être conservée; condamnés à la plus effrayse ante misère, sans avoir été ni pu être entendus, ils ne murmurent ce point, ils restent sidèles aux principes du plus pur patriotisme: " ils sont encore prêts à verser leur sang pour le maintien de 14 Constitution, qui va reduire leur Ville à la plus déplorable " nullité." These people are not supposed to have endured those sufferings and injustices in a druggle for liberty, for the Q 2 fame fame account states truly that they had been always free; their patience in beggary and ruin, and their suffering, without remonstrance, the most stagrant and confessed injustice, if strictly true, can be nothing but the effect of this dire fanaticism. A great multitude all over France is in the same condition and the same temper.

The spirit of proselytism attends this spirit of fanaticism. They have societies to cabal and correspond at home and abroad for the propagation of their tenets. The republic of Berne, one of the happiest, the most prosperous, and the best governed countries upon earth, is one of the great objects, at the destruction of which they aim. I am told they have in fome measure succeeded in fowing there the feeds of discontent. They are bufy throughout Germany. Spain and Italy have not been untried. England is not left out of the comprehensive scheme of their malignant charity; and in England we find those who stretch out their arms to them, who recommend their examples from more than one pulpit, and who choose, in more than one periodical meeting, publicly to correspond with them, to applaud them, and to hold them up as objects for imitation; who receive from them tokens of confraternity, and standards consecrated amidst their rites and mysteries *; who suggest to them leagues of perpetual amity, at the very time when the power, to which our constitution has exclusively delegated the federative capacity of this kingdom, may find it expedient to make war upon them.

· See the proceedings of the confederation at Nantz.

It is not the confiscation of our church property from this example in France that I dread, though I think this would be no trifling evil. The great fource of my folicitude is, lest it should ever be considered in England as the policy of a state, to seek a resource in confiscations of any kind; or that any one description of citizens should be brought to regard any of the others as their proper prey*. Nations are wading deeper and deeper into an ocean of boundless debt. Public debts, which at first were a security to governments, by interesting many in the public tranquillity, are likely in their excess to become the means of their subversion. If governments provide for these debts by heavy impositions, they per rish by becoming odious to the people. If they do not provide for them, they will be undone by the efforts of the most dangerous of all parties; I mean an extensive discontented monied interest, injured and not destroyed. The men who compose this interest look for their fecurity, in the first instance, to the fidelity of government; in the fecond, to its power. If they find the old governments effete, worn out, and with their fprings relaxed, fo as not to be of fufficient vigour for their purposes, they may feek new ones that shall be possessed of more energy; and this energy will be derived, not from an acquisition of resources, but from a contempt of justice. Revolutions are favourable to confiscation; and it is impossible to know under what obnoxious names the next confiscations will be authorifed. I am fure that the principles predominant in France extend to very many persons and descriptions of persons in all countries who think their innoxious indolence their fecurity. This kind of innocence in proprietors may be argued into inutility; and inutility into an unfitness for their estates. Many parts of Europe are in open disorder. In many others there is a hollow murmuring under ground; a confused movement is felt, that threatens a general earthquake in the political world. Already confederacies and correspondences of the most extraordinary nature are forming, in feveral countries*. In fuch a flate of things we ought to hold ourselves upon our guard, In all mutations (if mutations must be) the circumstance which will serve most to blunt the edge of their mischief, and to promote what good may be in them, is, that they should find us with our minds tenacious of justice, and tender of property.

But it will be argued, that this confication in France ought not to alarm other nations. They fay it is not made from wanton rapacity; that it is a great measure of national policy, adopted to remove an extensive, inveterate, superstitious mischief. It is with the greatest difficulty that I am able to separate policy from justice. Justice is itself the great standing policy of civil society; and any eminent departure from it, under any circumstances, lies under the suspicion of being no policy at all.

When men are encouraged to go into a certain mode of life by the existing laws, and protected in that mode as in a lawful occupation-when they have accommodated all their ideas, and all their habits to it-when the law had long made their adherence to its rules a ground of reputation, and their departure from them a ground of difgrace and even of penalty-I am fure it is unjust in legiflature, by an arbitrary act, to offer a fudden violence to their minds and their feelings; forcibly to degrade them from their state and condition, and to stigmatize with shame and infamy that character and those customs which before had been made the measure of their happiness and honour. If to this be added an expulsion from their habitations, and a confiscation of all their goods, I am not fagacious enough to discover how this despotic fport, Q 4 fport, made of the feelings, consciences, prejudices, and properties of men, can be discriminated from the rankest tyranny.

If the injustice of the course pursued in France be clear, the policy of the measure, that is, the public benefit to be expected from it, ought to be at least as evident, and at least as important. To a man who acts under the influence of no paffion, who has nothing in view in his projects but the public good, a great difference will immediately strike him, between what policy would dictate on the original introduction of fuch inflitutions, and on a question of their total abolition, where they have cast their roots wide and deep, and where by long habit things more valuable than themselves are so adapted to them, and in a manner interwoven with them, that the one cannot be destroyed without notably impairing the other. He might be embarraffed, if the case were really such as sophisters represent it in their paltry style of debating. But in this, as in most questions of state, there is a middle. There is fomething else than the mere alternative of absolute destruction, or unreformed existence. Spartam nactus es; banc exorna. This is, in my opinion, a rule of profound fenfe, and ought never to depart from the mind of an honest reformer. I cannot conceive how any man can have brought himself to that pitch of presumption, to confider his country as nothing but carte blanche, upon which he may fcribble whatever he pleafes, A man full of warm speculative benevolence may wish his fociety otherwise constituted than he finds it; but a good patriot, and a true politician, always confiders considers how he shall make the most of the existing materials of his country. A disposition to preferve, and an ability to improve, taken together, would be my standard of a statesman. Every thing else is vulgar in the conception, perilous in the execution.

There are moments in the fortune of states when particular men are called to make improvements by great mental exertion. In those moments, even when they feem to enjoy the confidence of their prince and country, and to be invested with full authority they have not always apt instruments. A politician, to do great things, looks for a power, what our workmen call a purchase; and if he finds that power, in politics as in mechanics he cannot be at a lofs to apply it. In the monaftic institutions, in my opinion, was found a great power for the mechanism of politic benevolence. There were revenues with a public direction; there were men wholly fet apart and dedicated to public purposes, without any other than public ties and public principles; men without the possibility of converting the eftate of the community into a private fortune; men denied to felf-interefts, whose avarice is for fome community; men to whom perfonal poverty is honour, and implicit obedience stands in the place of freedom. In vain shall a man look to the possibility of making fuch things when he wants them. The winds blow as they lift. These institutions are the products of enthusiasin: they are the instruments of wisdom. Wisdom cannot create materials; they are the gifts of nature or of chance; her pride is in the use. The perennial perennial existence of bodies corporate and their fortunes, are things particularly fuited to a man who has long views; who meditates defigns that require time in fashioning; and which propose duration when they are accomplished. He is not deserving to rank high, or even to be mentioned in the order of great statesmen, who, having obtained the command and direction of fuch a power as existed in the wealth, the discipline, and the habits of fuch corporations, as those which you have rashly destroyed, cannot find any way of converting it to the great and lasting benefit of his country. On the view of this subject a thousand uses suggest themselves to a contriving mind. To deftroy any power, growing wild from the rank productive force of the human mind, is almost tantamount, in the moral world, to the destruction of the apparently active properties of bodies in the material. It would be like the attempt to destroy (if it were in our competence to destroy) the expansive force of fixed air in nitre, or the power of fleam, or of electricity, or of magnetism. These energies always exifted in nature, and they were always difcernible. They feemed, fome of them unferviceable, fome noxious, fome no better than a fport to children; until contemplative ability, combining with practic skill, tamed their wild nature, fubdued them to use, and rendered them at once the most powerful and the most tractable agents, in subservience to the great views and defigns of men. Did fifty thousand persons, whose mental and whose bodily labour labour you might direct, and so many hundred thousand a year of a revenue, which was neither lazy nor superstitious, appear too big for your abilities to wield? Had you no way of using the men but by converting monks into pensioners? Had you no way of turning the revenue to account, but through the improvident resource of a spendthrist sale? If you were thus destitute of mental funds, the proceeding is in its natural course. Your politicians do not understand their trade; and therefore they sell their tools.

But the inftitutions favour of fuperstition in their very principle; and they nourish it by a permanent and standing influence. This I do not mean to dispute; but this ought not to hinder you from deriving from superstition itself any resources which may thence be furnished for the public advantage. You derive benefits from many dispositions and many passions of the human mind, which are of as doubtful a colour in the moral eye, as fuperstition itself. It was your business to correct and mitigate every thing which was noxious in this passion, as in all the passions. But is superstition the greatest of all possible vices? In its possible excess I think it becomes a very great evil. It is, however, a moral subject; and of course admits of all degrees and all modifications. Superflition is the religion of feeble minds; and they must be tolerated in an intermixture of it, in some trifling or some enthusiaftic shape or other, else you will deprive weak minds of a resource found necessary to the strongest. The body of all true religion confifts, to be fure, in obedience to the will of the fovereign of the world; in a confidence in his declarations; and an imitation of his perfections. The reft is our own. It may be prejudicial to the great end; it may be auxiliary. Wife men, who as fuch, are not admirers (not admirers at least of the Munera Terræ) are not violently attached to these things, nor do they violently hate them. Wisdom is not the most fevere corrector of folly. They are the rival follies, which mutually wage fo unrelenting a war; and which make fo cruel a use of their advantages, as they can happen to engage the immoderate vulgar on the one fide or the other in their quarrels. Prudence would be neuter; but if, in the contention between fond attachment and fierce antipathy concerning things in their nature not made to produce fuch heats, a prudent man were obliged to make a choice of what errors and excesses of enthusiasm he would condemn or bear, perhaps he would think the fuperstition which builds, to be more tolerable than that which demolishes-that which adorns a country, than that which deforms it-that which endows, than that which plunders-that which disposes to mistaken beneficence, than that which stimulates to real injustice-that which leads a man to refuse to himfelf lawful pleafures, than that which fhatches from others the fcanty fublishence of their felf-denial. Such, I think, is very nearly the state of the question between the ancient founders of monkish fuperstition, and the superstition of the pretended philosophers of the hour.

For the present I postpone all consideration of the supposed public profit of the sale, which however

I conceive to be perfectly delufive. I shall here only consider it as a transfer of property. On the policy of that transfer I shall trouble you with a few thoughts.

In every prosperous community something more is produced than goes to the immediate support of the producer. This surplus forms the income of the landed capitalist. It will be spent by a proprietor who does not labour. But this idleness is itself the spring of labour; this repose the spur to industry. The only concern of the state is, that the capital taken in rent from the land, should be returned again to the industry from whence it came; and that its expenditure should be with the least possible detriment to the morals of those who expend it, and to those of the people to whom it is returned.

In all the views of receipt, expenditure, and perfonal employment, a fober legislator would carefully compare the poffeffor whom he was recommended to expel, with the stranger who was proposed to fill his place. Before the inconveniences are incurred which must attend all violent revolutions in property through extensive confiscation, we ought to have some rational affurance that the purchasers of the confiscated property will be in a confiderable degree more laborious, more virtuous, more fober, less disposed to extort an unreasonable proportion of the gains of the labourer, or to confume on themfelves a larger share than is fit for the measure of an individual, or that they should be qualified to dispense the surplus in a more steady and equal mode, so as to answer the purposes of a politic expenditure, than the old poffesfors, call those possessions, bishops, or canons, or commendatory abbots, or monks, or what you please. The monks are lazy. Be it fo. Suppose them no otherwise employed than by finging in the choir. They are as utefully employed as those who neither sing nor say. As usefully even as those who sing upon the stage. They are as usefully employed as if they worked from dawn to dark in the innumerable fervile, degrading, unfeemly, unmanly, and often most unwholesome and pestiferous occupations, to which by the social economy fo many wretches are inevitably doomed. If it were not generally pernicious to diffurb the natural course of things, and to impede, in any degree, the great wheel of circulation which is turned by the strangely directed labour of these unhappy people, I should be infinitely more inclined forcibly to rescue them from their miserable industry, than violently to disturb the tranquil repose of monastic quietude. Humanity, and perhaps policy, might better justify me in the one than in the other. It is a fubject on which I have often reflected, and never reflected without feeling from it. I am fure that no confideration, except the necessity of submitting to the yoke of luxury, and the despotism of fancy, who in their own imperious way will diffribute the furplus product of the foil, can justify the toleration of fuch trades and employments in a well-regulated state. But, for this purpose of distribution, it seems to me, that the idle expences of monks are quite as well directed as the idle expences of us lay-loiterers.

When the advantages of the possession, and of the project, are on a par, there is no motive for a change,

But in the present case, perhaps they are not upon a par, and the difference is in favour of the possession. It does not appear to me, that the expences of those whom you are going to expel, do, in fact, take a course so directly and so generally leading to viriate and degrade and render miferable those through whom they pass, as the expences of those favourites whom you are intruding into their houses. Why should the expenditure of a great landed property, which is a dispersion of the surplus product of the soil, appear intolerable to you or to me, when it takes its course through the accumulation of vast libraries, which are the hiftory of the force and weakness of the human mind; through great collections of antient records, medals, and coins, which attest and explain laws and customs; through paintings and statues, that, by imitating nature, feem to extend the limits of creation; through grand monuments of the dead. which continue the regards and connexions of life beyond the grave; through collections of the specimens of nature, which become a representative affembly of all the classes and families of the world, that by disposition facilitate, and, by exciting curiosity, open the avenues to science? If, by great permanent establishments, all these objects of expence are better fecured from the inconstant sport of personal caprice and personal extravagance, are they worse than if the same tastes prevailed in scattered individuals? Does not the sweat of the mason and carpenter, who toil in order to partake the fweat of the peafant, flow as pleafantly and as falubrioufly, in the construction and repair of the majestic edifices of religion, as in the painted booths and fordid fordid flies of vice and luxury; as honourably and as profitably in repairing those facred works, which grow hoary with innumerable years, as on the momentary receptacles of transient voluptuousness; in opera-houses, and brothels, and gaminghouses, and club-houses, and obelisks in the Champ de Mars? Is the furplus product of the olive and the vine worfe employed in the frugal fustenance of persons, whom the fictions of a pious imagination raifes to dignity by construing in the service of God, than in pampering the innumerable multitude of those who are degraded by being made uscless domestics subservient to the pride of man? Are the decorations of temples an expenditure less worthy a wife man than ribbons, and laces, and national cockades, and petits maifons, and petit foupers, and all the innumerable fopperies and follies in which opulence sports away the burthen of its superfluity?

We tolerate even these; not from love of them, but for sear of worse. We tolerate them, because property and liberty, to a degree, require that toleration. But why proscribe the other, and surely, in every point of view, the more laudable use of estates? Why, through the violation of all property, through an outrage upon every principle of liberty, forcibly carry them from the better to the worse?

This comparison between the new individuals and the old corps is made upon a supposition that no reform could be made in the latter. But in a question of reformation, I always consider corporate bodies, whether sole or consisting of many,

to be much more susceptible of a public direction by the power of the state, in the use of their property, and in the regulation of modes and habits of life in their members, than private citizens ever can be, or perhaps ought to be; and this seems to me a very material consideration for those who undertake any thing which merits the name of a politic enterprize.—So far as to the estates of monasteries.

With regard to the effates possessed by bishops and canons, and commendatory abbots, I cannot find out for what reason some landed estates may not be held otherwise than by inheritance. Can any philosophic spoiler undertake to demonstrate the positive or the comparative evil, of having a certain, and that too a large portion of landed property, passing in succession thro' persons whose title to it is, always in theory, and often in fact, an eminent degree of piety, morals, and learning; a property which, by its destination, in their turn, and on the score of merit, gives to the noblest families renovation and support, to the lowest the means of dignity and elevation; a property, the tenure of which is the performance of fome duty, (whatever value you may choose to set upon that duty) and the character of whose proprietors demands at least an exterior decorum and gravity of manners; who are to exercise a generous but temperate hospitality; part of whose income they are to consider as a trust for charity; and who, even when they fail in their truft, when they flide from their character, and degenerate into a mere common fecular nobleman or gentleman, are in no respect worse than R those those who may succeed them in their forfeited posfessions? Is it better that estates should be held by those who have no duty than by those who have one ?-by those whose character and destination point to virtues, than by those who have no rule and direction in the expenditure of their eftates but their own will and appetite? Nor are these estates held altogether in the character or with the evils supposed inherent in mortmain. They pass from hand to hand with a more rapid circulation than any other. No excess is good; and therefore too great a proportion of landed property may be held officially for life; but it does not feem to me of material injury to any commonwealth, that there should exist some estates that have a chance of being acquired by other means than the previous acquisition of money.

This letter is grown to a great length, though it is indeed short with regard to the infinite extent of the subject. Various avocations have from time to time called my mind from the subject. I was not forry to give myself leisure to observe whether, in the proceedings of the national assembly, I might not find reasons to change or to qualify some of my first sentiments. Every thing has confirmed me more strongly in my first opinions. It was my original purpose to take a view of the principles of the national assembly with regard to the great and sundamental establishments; and to compare the whole of what you have substituted in the place of what you have destroyed, with the several members of our British constitution. But this plan is of greater extent than at first I computed, and I find that you have little defire to take the advantage of any examples. At prefent I must content myself with some remarks upon your establishments; reserving for another time what I proposed to say concerning the spirit of our British monarchy, aristocracy, and democracy, as practically they exist.

I have taken a review of what has been done by the governing power in France. I have certainly spoke of it with freedom. Those whose principle it is to despise the antient permanent fense of mankind, and to set up a scheme of fociety on new principles, must naturally expect that fuch of us who think better of the judgment of the human race than of theirs, should consider both them and their devices, as men and schemes upon their trial. They must take it for granted that we attend much to their reason, but not at all to their authority. They have not one of the great influencing prejudices of mankind in their favour. They avow their hostility to opinion. Of course they must expect no support from that influence, which, with every other authority, they have deposed from the feat of its jurisdiction.

I can never confider this affembly as any thing elfe than a voluntary affociation of men, who have availed themselves of circumstances, to feize upon the power of the state. They have not the fanction and authority of the character under which they first met. They have affumed another of a very different nature; and have completely altered and inverted all the relations in which they originally flood. They do not hold the authority they exercise under any constitutional law of the state. They have departed from the instructions of the people by whom they were sent; which instructions, as the assembly did not act in virtue of any antient usage or settled law, were the sole source of their authority. The most considerable of their acts have not been done by great majorities; and in this fort of near divisions, which carry only the constructive authority of the whole, strangers will consider reasons as well as resolutions.

If they had fet up this new experimental government as a necessary substitute for an expelled tyranny, mankind would anticipate the time of prefcription, which, through long ufage, mellows into legality governments that were violent in their commencement. All those who have affections which lead them to the confervation of civil order would recognize, even in its cradle, the child as legitimate, which has been produced from those principles of cogent expediency to which all just governments owe their birth, and on which they justify their continuance. But they will be late and reluctant in giving any fort of countenance to the operations of a power, which has derived its birth from no law and no necessity; but which on the contrary has had its origin in those vices and finister practices by which the focial union is often diffurbed and fometimes destroyed. This affembly has hardly a year's prefcription. We have their own word for it that they have made a revolution.

To make a revolution is a measure which, prima fronte, requires an apology. To make a revolution is to subvert the antient state of our country; and no common reasons are called for to justify so violent a proceeding. The sense of mankind authorizes us to examine into the mode of acquiring new power, and to criticise on the use that is made of it with less awe and reverence than that which is usually conceded to a settled and recognized authority.

In obtaining and fecuring their power, the affembly proceeds upon principles the most opposite from those which appear to direct them in the use of it. An observation on this difference will let us into the true spirit of their conduct. Every thing which they have done, or continue to do, in order to obtain and keep their power, is by the most common arts. They proceed exactly as their ancestors of ambition have done before them. Trace them through all their artifices, frauds, and violences, you can find nothing at all that is new. They follow precedents and examples with the punctilious exactness of a pleader. They never depart an iota from the authentic formulas of tyranny and usurpation. But in all the regulations relative to the public good, the spirit has been the very reverse of this. There they commit the whole to the mercy of untried speculations; they abandon the dearest interests of the public to those loose theories, to which none of them would chuse to trust the slightest of his private concerns. They make this difference, because in their defire of obtaining and securing power they are thoroughly in earnest; there they travel in the beaten road. The public interests, because about them they have no real solicitude, they abandon wholly to chance; I say to chance, because their schemes have nothing in experience to prove their tendency beneficial.

We must always see with a pity not unmixed with respect, the errors of those who are timid and doubtful of themselves with regard to points wherein the happiness of mankind is concerned. But in these gentlemen there is nothing of the tender parental solicitude which sears to cut up the infant for the sake of an experiment. In the vastness of their promises, and the considence of their predictions, they far outdo all the boasting of empirics. The arrogance of their pretensions, in a manner provokes, and challenges us to an enquiry into their foundation.

I am convinced that there are men of confiderable parts among the popular leaders in the national affembly. Some of them display eloquence in their speeches and their writings. This cannot be without powerful and cultivated talents. But eloquence may exift without a proportionable degree of wifdom. When I fpeak of ability, I am obliged to diffinguish. What they have done towards the support of their fystem bespeaks no ordinary men. In the fyftern itself, taken as the scheme of a republic constructed for procuring the prosperity and fecurity of the citizen, and for promoting the strength and grandeur of the state, I confess myfelf unable to find out any thing which displays, in a fingle instance, the work of a comprehensive and difpoling mind, or even the provisions of a vulgar prudence.

prudence. Their purpose every where seems to have been to evade and flip afide from difficulty. This it has been the glory of the great mafters in all the arts to confront, and to overcome; and when they had overcome the first difficulty, to turn it into an instrument for new conquests over new difficulties; thus to enable them to extend the empire of their science; and even to push forward beyond the reach of their original thoughts, the land marks of the human understanding itself. Difficulty is a severe instructor, set over us by the supreme ordinance of a parental guardian and legiflator, who knows us better than we know ourfelves, as he loves us better too. Pater ipse colendi band facilem effe viam voluit. He that wrestles with us ftrengthens our nerves, and sharpens our skill. Our antagonist is our helper. This amicable conflict with difficulty obliges us to an intimate acquaintance with our object, and compels us to confider it in all its relations. It will not fuffer us to be fuperficial. It is the want of nerves of understanding for such a task; it is the degenerate fondness for tricking short-cuts, and little fallacious facilities, that has in fo many parts of the world created governments with arbitrary powers. They have created the late arbitrary monarchy of France. They have created the arbitrary republic of Paris. With them defects in wisdom are to be supplied by the plenitude of force. They get nothing by it. Commencing their labours on a principle of floth, they have the common fortune of flothful men. The difficulties which they rather had eluded than escaped, meet them again in their R 4 courfe :

course; they multiply and thicken on them; they are involved, through a labyrinth of confused detail, in an industry without limit, and without direction; and, in conclusion, the whole of their work becomes feeble, vitious, and insecure.

It is this inability to wreftle with difficulty which has obliged the arbitrary affembly of France to commence their schemes of reform with abolition and total destruction*. But is it in destroying and pulling down that skill is displayed? Your mob can do this as well at least as your affemblies. The shallowest understanding, the rudest hand, is more than equal to that task. Rage and phrenzy will pull down more in half an hour, than prudence, deliberation, and foresight can build up in an hundred years. The errors and desects of old establishments are visible and palpable. It calls for little ability to point them out; and where absolute power is given, it requires but a word wholly to abolish the vice and the establishment together. The fame lazy but reftless disposition, which loves sloth and hates quiet, directs these politicians, when they come to work, for supplying the place of what they have destroyed. To make every thing the reverse of what they have seen is quite as easy as to destroy. No difficulties occur in what has never been tried. Criticism is almost bassled in discovering the desects of what has not existed; and eager enthusiasm, and cheating hope, have all the wide field of imagination in which they may expatiate with little or no opposition.

^{*} A leading member of the affembly, M. Rabaud de St. Etienne, has expressed the principle of all their proceedings as clearly as possible. Nothing can be more simple:—" Tous les établissemens en France couronnent le malbeur du peuple: pour le rendre heureux il faut le renouveler; changer ses idées; changer ses loix; changer ses mœurs; changer les bommes; changer les choses; changer les mois tout detruire; oui, tout détruire; puisque tout est à recréer." This gentleman was chosen president in an assembly not sitting at the Quinze vingt, or the Petites Maisons; and composed of persons giving themselves out to be rational beings; but neither his ideas, language, or conduct, differ in the smallest degree from the discourses, opinions, and actions of those within and without the assembly, who direct the operations of the machine now at work in France.

At once to preserve and to reform is quite another thing. When the useful parts of an old establishment are kept, and what is superadded is to be fitted to what is retained, a vigorous mind, fleady persevering attention, various powers of comparison and combination, and the resources of an understanding fruitful in expedients are to be exercised; they are to be exercised in a continued conflict with the combined force of opposite vices; with the obstinacy that rejects all improvement, and the levity that is fatigued and difgusted with every thing of which it is in posfession. But you may object-" A process of this "kind is flow, It is not fit for an affembly, which " glories in performing in a few months the work of ages. Such a mode of reforming, possibly " might take up many years." Without question it might; and it ought. It is one of the excellencies of a method in which time is amongst the affiftants, that its operation is flow, and in some cases almost imperceptible. If circumspection and caution are a part of wifdom, when we work only upon inanimate matter, furely they become a part of duty too, when the fubject of our demolition and construction is not brick and timber, but sentient beings, by the fudden alteration of whose state, condition, and habits, multitudes may be rendered miserable. But it seems as if it were the prevalent opinion in Paris, that an unfeeling heart, and an undoubting confidence, are the fole qualifications for a perfect legislator. Far different are my ideas of that high office. The true lawgiver ought to have an heart full of fenfibility. He ought to love and respect his kind, and to fear himself. It may be allowed to his temperament to catch his ultimate object with an intuitive glance; but his movements towards it ought to be deliberate. Political arrangement, as it is a work for focial ends, is to be only wrought by focial means. There mind must conspire with mind. Time is required to produce that union of minds which alone can produce all the good we aim at. Our patience will atchieve more than our force. If I might venture to appeal to what is fo much out of fashion in Paris, I mean to experience, I should tell you, that in my course I have known, and, according to my measure, have co-operated with great men; and I have never yet feen any plan which has not been mended by the observations of those who were much inferior in understanding to the person who took the lead in the business. By a slow but well-fustained progress, the effect of each step is watched; the good or ill fuccess of the first, gives light to us in the fecond; and fo, from light to light, light, we are conducted with fafety through the whole feries. We fee, that the parts of the fystem do not clash. The evils latent in the most promising contrivances are provided for as they arise. One advantage is as little as possible facrificed to another. We compensate, we reconcile, we balance. We are enabled to unite into a confistent whole the various anomalies and contending principles that are found in the minds and affairs of men. From hence arifes, not an excellence in fimplicity, but one far fuperior, an excellence in composition. Where the great interests of mankind are concerned through a long fuccession of generations, that succession ought to be admitted into fome share in the councils which are so deeply to affect them. If justice requires this, the work itself requires the aid of more minds than one age can furnish. It is from this view of things that the best legislators have been often satisfied with the establishment of some fure, folid, and ruling principle in government; a power like that which fome of the philosophers have called a plastic nature; and having fixed the principle, they have left it afterwards to its own operation.

To proceed in this manner, that is, to proceed with a prefiding principle, and a prolific energy, is with me the criterion of profound wifdom. What your politicians think the marks of a bold, hardy genius, are only proofs of a deplorable want of ability. By their violent hafte, and their defiance of the process of nature, they are delivered over blindly to every projector and adventurer, to every alchymist and empiric. They defpair spair of turning to account any thing that is common. Diet is nothing in their fystem of remedy. The worst of it is, that this their defpair of curing common diftempers by regular methods, arises not only from defect of comprehenfion, but, I fear, from fome malignity of disposition. Your legislators feem to have taken their opinions of all professions, ranks, and offices, from the declamations and buffooneries of fatirifts; who would themselves be astonished if they were held to the letter of their own descriptions. By listening only to thefe, your leaders regard all things only on the fide of their vices and faults, and view those vices and faults under every colour of exaggeration. It is undoubtedly true, though it may feem paradoxical; but in general, those who are habitually employed in finding and difplaying faults, are unqualified for the work of reformation: because their minds are not only unfurnished with patterns of the fair and good, but by habit they come to take no delight in the contemplation of those things. By hating vices too much, they come to love men too little. It is therefore not wonderful, that they should be indifposed and unable to serve them. From hence arises the complexional disposition of some of your guides to pull every thing in pieces. At this malicious game they display the whole of their quadrimanous activity. As to the rest, the paradoxes of eloquent writers, brought forth purely as a sport of fancy, to try their talents, to rouze attention, and excite furprize, are taken up by these gentlemen, not in the spirit of the original authors.

authors, as means of cultivating their tafte and improving their ftyle. These paradoxes become with them ferious grounds of action, upon which they proceed in regulating the most important concerns of the state. Cicero ludicrously describes Cato as endeavouring to act in the commonwealth upon the school paradoxes which exercised the wits of the junior students in the stoic philosophy. If this was true of Cato, these gentlemen copy after him in the manner of some persons who lived about his time-pede nudo Catonem. Mr. Hume told me. that he had from Rouffeau himfelf the fecret of his principles of composition. That acute, though eccentric, observer had perceived, that to flrike and interest the public, the marvellous must be produced; that the marvellous of the heathen mythology had long fince loft its effect; that giants, magicians, fairies, and heroes of romance which fucceeded, had exhausted the portion of credulity which belonged to their age; that now nothing was left to a writer but that species of the marvellous, which might still be produced, and with as great an effect as ever, though in another way; that is, the marvellous in life, in manners, in characters, and in extraordinary fituations, giving rife to new and unlooked-for strokes in politics and morals. I believe, that were Rouffeau alive, and in one of his lucid intervals, he would be shocked at the practical phrenzy of his scholars, who in their paradoxes are fervile imitators; and even in their incredulity discover an implicit faith.

Men who undertake confiderable things, even in a regular way, ought to give us ground to prefume ability. But the physician of the flate, who not fatisfied with the cure of differencers, undertakes to regenerate conflitutions, ought to shew uncommon powers. Some very unufual appearances of wisdom ought to display themselves on the face of the defigns of those who appeal to no practice, and who copy after no model. Has any fuch been manifested? I shall take a view (it shall for the subject be a very short one) of what the affembly has done, with regard, first, to the constitution of the legislature; in the next place, to that of the executive power; then to that of the judicature; afterwards to the model of the army; and conclude with the system of finance, to see whether we can discover in any part of their schemes the portentous ability, which may justify these bold undertakers in the fuperiority which they affume over mankind.

It is in the model of the fovereign and prefiding part of this new republic, that we should expect their grand display. Here they were to prove their title to their proud demands. For the plan itself at large, and for the reasons on which it is grounded, I refer to the journals of the affembly of the 29th of September 1789, and to the fublequent proceedings which have made any alterations in the plan. So far as in a matter somewhat confused I can see light, the system remains substantially as it has been originally framed. My few remarks will be fuch as regard its spirit, its tendency, and its fitness for framing a popular commonwealth, which they profess theirs to be, fuited to the ends for which any commonwealth, and particularly cularly fuch a commonwealth, is made. At the fame time, I mean to confider its confiftency with itself, and its own principles.

Old establishments are tried by their effects. If the people are happy, united, wealthy, and powerful, we prefume the rest. We conclude that to be good from whence good is derived. In old establishments various correctives have been found for their aberrations from theory. Indeed they are the refults of various necessities and expediences. They are not often constructed after any theory; theories are rather drawn from them. In them we often fee the end best obtained, where the means seem not perfectly reconcileable to what we may fancy was the original scheme. The means taught by experience may be better fuited to political ends than those contrived in the original project. They again re-act upon the primitive constitution, and sometimes improve the defign itself from which they feem to have departed. I think all this might be curiously exemplified in the British conflitution. At worst, the errors and deviations of every kind in reckoning are found and computed, and the ship proceeds in her course. This is the case of old establishments; but in a new and merely theoretic fystem, it is expected that every contrivance shall appear, on the face of it, to answer its end; especially where the projectors are no way embarraffed with an endeavour to accommodate the new building to an old one, either in the walls or on the foundations.

The French builders, clearing away as mere rubbish whatever they found, and, like their ornamental gardeners, forming every thing into an exact level, propose to rest the whole local and general legislature on three bases of three different kinds; one geometrical, one arithmetical, and the third financial; the first of which they call the basis of territory; the second, the basis of population; and the third, the basis of contribution. For the accomplishment of the first of these purposes they divide the area of their country into eighty-one pieces, regularly square, of eighteen leagues by eighteen. These large divisions are called Departments. These they portion, proceeding by fquare measurement, into feventeen hundred and twenty districts called Communes. These again they subdivide, still proceeding by fquare meafurement, into smaller districts called Cantons, making in all 6,400.

At first view this geometrical basis of theirs prefents not much to admire or to blame. It calls for no great legislative talents. Nothing more than an accurate land furveyor, with his chain, fight, and theodolite, is requisite for such a plan as this. In the old divisions of the country various accidents at various times, and the ebb and flow of various properties and jurifdictions, fettled their bounds. These bounds were not made upon any fixed fystem undoubtedly. They were subject to fome inconveniencies; but they were inconveniencies for which use had found remedies, and habit had supplied accommodation and patience. In this new pavement of square within square, and this organifation and femiorganifation made on the fyftem of Empedocles and Buffon, and not upon any politic principle, it is impossible that innumerable innumerable local inconveniencies, to which men are not habituated, must not arise. But these I pass over, because it requires an accurate knowledge of the country, which I do not posses, to fpecify them.

When these state surveyors came to take a view of their work of measurement, they soon found, that in politics, the most fallacious of all things was geometrical demonstration. They had then recourse to another basis (or rather buttress) to fupport the building which tottered on that false foundation. It was evident, that the goodness of the foil, the number of the people, their wealth, and the largeness of their contribution, made such infinite variations between square and square as to render mensuration a ridiculous standard of power in the commonwealth, and equality in geometry the most unequal of all measures in the distribution of men. However, they could not give it up. But dividing their political and civil representation into three parts, they allotted one of those parts to the square measurement, without a fingle fact or calculation to afcertain whether this territorial proportion of reprefentation was fairly affigned, and ought upon any principle really to be a third. Having however given to geometry this portion (of a third for her dower) out of compliment I suppose to that sublime science, they left the other two to be scuffled for between the other parts, of population and contribution.

When they came to provide for population, they were not able to proceed quite fo fmoothly as they had done in the field of their geometry.

Here

Here their arithmetic came to bear upon their juridical metaphyfics. Had they stuck to their metaphyfic principles, the arithmetical process would be simple indeed. Men, with them, are strictly equal, and are entitled to equal rights in their own government. Each head, on this system, would have its vote, and every man would vote directly for the person who was to represent him in the legiflature. "But fost-by regular degrees, not yet." This metaphyfic principle, to which law, cuftom, usage, policy, reason, were to yield, is to yield itself to their pleasure. There must be many degrees, and fome stages, before the representative can come in contact with his constituent. Indeed, as we shall foon see, these two persons are to have no fort of communion with each other. First, the voters in the Canton, who compose what they call primary assemblies, are to have a qualification. What! a qualification on the indefeafible rights of men? Yes; but it shall be a very small qualification. Our injuffice shall be very little oppressive; only the local valuation of three days labour paid to the Why, this is not much, I readily admit, for any thing but the utter subversion of your equalifing principle. As a qualification it might as well be let alone; for it answers no one purpose for which qualifications are established; and, on your ideas, it excludes from a vote, the man of all others whose natural equality stands the most in need of protection and defence; I mean the man who has nothing else but his natural equality to guard him. You order him to buy the right, which you before told him nature had given to him gratuitoufly gratuitously at his birth, and of which no authority on earth could lawfully deprive him. With regard to the person who cannot come up to your market, a tyrannous aristocracy, as against him, is established at the very outset, by you who pretend to be its fworn foe.

The gradation proceeds. These primary affemblies of the Canton elect deputies to the Commune ; one for every two hundred qualified inhabitants. Here is the first medium put between the primary elector and the representative legislator; and here a new turnpike is fixed for taxing the rights of men with a fecond qualification: for none can be elected into the Commune who does not pay the amount of ten days labour. Nor have we yet done. There is still to be another gradation. These Communes, chosen by the Canton, choose to the Department; and the deputies of the Department choose their deputies to the National Assembly. Here is a third barrier of a fenfeless qualification. Every deputy to the national affembly must pay, in direct contribution, to the value of a mark of filver. Of all these qualifying barriers we must think alike; that they are impotent to fecure independence; ftrong only to destroy the rights of men.

In all this process, which in its fundamental elements affects to consider only population upon a principle of natural right, there is a manifest attention to property; which, however just and reasonable on other schemes, is on theirs perfectly unsupportable.

When they come to their third basis, that of Contribution, we find that they have more completely pletely loft fight of their rights of men. This last basis rests entirely on property. A principle totally different from the equality of men, and utterly irreconcileable to it, is thereby admitted; but no fooner is this principle admitted, than (as ufual) it is subverted; and it is not subverted, (as we shall presently see;) to approximate the inequality of riches to the level of nature. The additional share in the third portion of representation, (a portion referved exclusively for the higher contribution.) is made to regard the district only, and not the individuals in it who pay. It is easy to perceive, by the course of their reasonings, how much they were embarraffed by their contradictory ideas of the rights of men and the privileges of riches. The committee of constitution do as good as admit that they are wholly irreconcileable. The relation, with regard to the contributions, is without doubt null (fay they) when the " question is on the balance of the political rights " as between individual and individual; without " which personal equality would be destroyed, and an aristocracy of the rich would be established. But this inconvenience entirely disappears when " the proportional relation of the contribution is " only confidered in the great masses, and is folely " between province and province; it ferves in that " case only to form a just reciprocal proportion between the cities, without affecting the personal " rights of the citizens."

Here the principle of contribution, as taken between man and man, is reprobated as null, and destructive to equality; and as pernicious too; because it leads to the establishment of an aristocracy of the rich. However, it must not be abandoned. And the way of getting rid of the difficulty is to establish the inequality as between department and department, leaving all the individuals in each department upon an exact par. Observe, that this parity between individuals had been before destroyed when the qualifications within the departments were fettled; nor does it feem a matter of great importance whether the equality of men be injured by maffes or individually. An individual is not of the fame importance in a mass represented by a few, as in a mass represented by many. It would be too much to tell a man jealous of his equality, that the elector has the same franchise who votes for three members as he who votes for ten.

Now take it in the other point of view, and let us suppose their principle of representation according to contribution, that is according to riches, to be well imagined, and to be a necessary basis for their republic. In this their third basis they affume, that riches ought to be respected, and that justice and policy require that they should entitle men, in some mode or other, to a larger share in the administration of public affairs; it is now to be feen, how the affembly provides for the pre-eminence, or even for the fecurity of the rich, by conferring, in virtue of their opulence, that larger measure of power to their diffrict which is denied to them personally. I readily admit, that in a republican government, which has a democratic basis, the rich do require an additional fecurity above what is necessary to them in monarchies. They are subject to envy, and through envy to oppression. On the present scheme, it is impossible to divine what advantage they derive from the ariftocratic preference upon which the unequal representation of the maffes is founded. The rich cannot feel it, either as a support to dignity, or as security to fortune: for the ariftocratic mass is generated from purely democratic principles; and the prevalence given to it in the general representation has no fort of reference to or connexion with the perfons, upon account of whose property this superiority of the mass is established. If the contrivers of this scheme meant any fort of favour to the rich in confequence of their contribution, they ought to have conferred the privilege either on the individual rich, or on fome class formed of rich persons; because the contest between the rich and the poor is not a struggle between corporation and corporation, but a contest between men and men; a competition not between districts but between descriptions. It would answer its purpose better if the scheme were inverted; that the votes of the masses were rendered equal; and that the votes within each mass were proportioned to property.

Let us suppose one man in a district (it is an easy supposition) to contribute as much as an hundred of his neighbours. Against these he has but one vote. If there were but one representative for the mass, his poor neighbours would outvote him by an hundred to one for that single representative. Bad enough. But amends are to be made him. How? The district, in virtue of his wealth, is to choose, say, ten members instead of one: that is to say, by paying a very large contribution he has the happiness of being outvoted, an hundred to one, by the poor for ten representatives, instead of being outvoted exactly in the same proportion for a single member. In truth, instead of benefitting by this fuperior quantity of reprefentation, the rich man is fubjected to an additional hardship. The encrease of representation within his province sets up nine persons more, and as many more than nine as there may be democratic candidates, to cabal and intrigue, and to flatter the people at his expence and to his oppression. An interest is by this means held out to multitudes of the inferior fort, in obtaining a falary of eighteen livres a day (to them a vast object) besides the pleasure of a residence in Paris and their share in the government of the kingdom. The more the objects of ambition are multiplied and become democratic, just in that proportion the rich are endangered.

Thus it must fare between the poor and the rich in the province deemed ariftocratic, which in its internal relation is the very reverse of that character. In its external relation, that is, its relation to the other provinces, I cannot fee how the unequal reprefentation, which is given to maffes on account of wealth, becomes the means of preferving the equipoise and the tranquillity of the commonwealth. For if it be one of the objects to fecure the weak from being crushed by the strong (as in all society undoubtedly it is) how are the fmaller and poorer of these masses to be saved from the tyranny of the more wealthy? Is it by adding to the wealthy further and more fystematical means of oppressing them.

them. When we come to a balance of representation between corporate bodies, provincial interests, emulations, and jealousies are full as likely to arise among them as among individuals; and their divisions are likely to produce a much hotter spirit of diffention, and something leading much more nearly to a war.

I fee that these aristocratic masses are made upon what is called the principle of direct contribution. Nothing can be a more unequal standard than this. The indirect contribution, that which arises from duties on confumption, is in truth a better standard, and follows and difcovers wealth more naturally than this of direct contribution. It is difficult indeed to fix a standard of local preference on account of the one, or of the other, or of both, because some provinces may pay the more of either or of both, on account of causes not intrinsic, but originating from those very districts over whom they have obtained a preference in confequence of their oftenfible contribution. If the maffes were independent fovereign bodies, who were to provide for a federative treasury by distinct contingents, and that the revenue had not (as it has) many impofitions running through the whole, which affect men individually, and not corporately, and which, by their nature, confound all territorial limits, fomething might be faid for the basis of contribution as founded on masses. But of all things, this representation, to be measured by contribution, is the most difficult to fettle upon principles of equity in a country, which confiders its diffricts as members of an whole. For a great city, fuch as Bourdeaux or Paris.

Paris, appears to pay a vast body of duties, almost out of all assignable proportion to other places, and its mass is considered accordingly. But are these cities the true contributors in that proportion? No. The consumers of the commodities imported into Bourdeaux, who are scattered through all France, pay the import duties of Bourdeaux. The produce of the vintage in Guienne and Languedoc give to that city the means of its contribution growing out of an export commerce. The landholders who spend their estates in Paris, and are thereby the creators of that city, contribute for Paris from the provinces out of which their revenues arise.

To compare together the three bases, not on their political reason, but on the ideas on which the affembly works, and to try its confiftency, with itself, we cannot avoid observing, that the principle which the committee call the basis of population, does not begin to operate from the fame point with the two other principles called the bases of territory and of contribution, which are both of an ariftocratic nature. The confequence is, that where all three begin to operate together, there is the most abfurd inequality produced by the operation of the former on the two latter principles. Every canton contains four fourre leagues, and is estimated to contain, on the average, 4,000 inhabitants, or 680 voters in the primary affemblies, which vary in numbers with the population of the canton, and fend one deputy to the commune for every 200 voters. Nine cantons make a commune.

Now let us take a canton containing a fea-port town of trade, or a great manufacturing town. Let us fuppose the population of this canton to be 12,700 inhabitants, or 2,193 voters, forming three primary assemblies, and sending ten deputies to the commune.

Oppose to this one canton two others of the remaining eight in the same commune. These we may suppose to have their fair population of 4,000 inhabitants, and 680 voters each, or 8,000 inhabitants and 1,360 voters, both together. These will form only two primary assemblies, and send only fix deputies to the commune.

When the affembly of the commune comes to vote on the basis of territory, which principle is first admitted to operate in that affembly, the single canton which has balf the territory of the other two, will have ten voices to six in the election of three deputies to the affembly of the department, chosen on the express ground of a representation of territory.

This inequality, striking as it is, will be yet highly aggravated, if we suppose, as we fairly may, the several other cantons of the commune to fall proportionably short of the average population, as much as the principal canton exceeds it. Now, as to the basis of contribution, which also is a principle admitted first to operate in the assembly of the commune. Let us again take one canton, such as is stated above. If the whole of the direct contributions paid by a great trading or manufacturing town be divided equally among the inhabitants, each individual will be found to pay much more than an individual living in the country according to the same average. The whole paid by the inhabitants of the former will be more than the whole paid by the inhabitants of the latter—we may fairly affume one-third more. Then the 12,700 inhabitants, or 2,193 voters of the canton will pay as much as 19,050 inhabitants, or 3,289 voters of the other cantons, which are nearly the estimated proportion of inhabitants and voters of five other cantons. Now the 2,193 voters will, as I before said, send only ten deputies to the assembly; the 3,289 voters will send fixteen. Thus, for an equal share in the contribution of the whole commune, there will be a difference of fixteen voices to ten in voting for deputies to be chosen on the principle of representing the general contribution of the whole commune.

By the same mode of computation we shall find 15,875 inhabitants, or 2,741 voters of the other cantons, who pay one-fixth Less to the contribution of the whole commune, will have three voices MORE than the 12,700 inhabitants, or 2,193 voters of the one canton.

Such is the fantastical and unjust inequality between mass and mass, in this curious repartition of the rights of representation arising out of territory and contribution. The qualifications which these confer are in truth negative qualifications, that give a right in an inverse proportion to the possession of them,

In this whole contrivance of the three bases, confider it in any light you please, I do not see a variety of objects, reconciled in one consistent whole, but several contradictory principles reluctantly and irreconcileably brought and held together by your philosophers, like wild beasts shut up in a cage, to claw and bite each other to their mutual destruction.

I am afraid I have gone too far into their way of confidering the formation of a conflitution. They have much, but bad, metaphyfics; much, but bad, geometry; much, but falfe, proportionate arithmetic; but if it were all as exact as metaphyfics, geometry, and arithmetic ought to be, and if their schemes were perfectly confistent in all their parts, it would make only a more fair and fightly vision. It is remarkable, that in a great arrangement of mankind, not one reference whatsoever is to be found to any thing moral or any thing politic; nothing that relates to the concerns, the actions, the passions, the interests of men. Hominem non Sapiunt.

You fee I only confider this conflictation as electoral, and leading by steps to the National Affembly. I do not enter into the internal government of the Departments, and their genealogy through the Communes and Cantons. These local governments are, in the original plan, to be as nearly as possible composed in the same manner and on the same principles with the elective assemblies. They are each of them bodies perfectly compact and rounded in themselves.

You cannot but perceive in this scheme, that it has a direct and immediate tendency to sever France into a variety of republics, and to render them totally independent of each other, without any direct constitutional means of coherence, connection, or subordination, except what may be derived from their acquiescence in the determinations of the general congress of the ambassadors from each independent republic. Such in reality is the National Assembly, and such governments I admit do exist in the world, though in forms infinitely more suitable to the local and habitual circumstances of their people. But such associations, rather than bodies politic, have generally been the effect of necessity, not choice; and I believe the present French power is the very first body of citizens, who, having obtained full authority to do with their country what they pleased, have chosen to dissever it in this barbarous manner.

It is impossible not to observe, that in the spirit of this geometrical distribution, and arithmetical arrangement, these pretended citizens treat France exactly like a country of conquest. Acting as conquerors, they have imitated the policy of the harshest of that harsh race. The policy of such barbarous victors, who contemn a fubdued people, and infult their feelings, has ever been, as much as in them lay, to destroy all vestiges of the antient country, in religion, in polity, in laws, and in manners; to confound all territorial limits; to produce a general poverty; to put up their properties to auction; to crush their princes, nobles, and pontiffs; to lay low every thing which had lifted its head above the level, or which could ferve to combine or rally, in their diffresses, the disbanded people, under the standard of old opinion. They have made France free in the manner in which those fincere friends to the rights of mankind, the Romans,

Romans, freed Greece, Macedon, and other nations. They destroyed the bonds of their union, under colour of providing for the independence of each of their cities.

When the members who compose these new bodies of cantons, communes, and departments, arrangements purpofely produced through the medium of confusion, begin to act, they will find themfelves, in a great measure, strangers to one another. The electors and elected throughout, especially in the rural cantons, will be frequently without any civil habitudes or connections, or any of that natural difcipline which is the foul of a true republic. Magistrates and collectors of revenue are now no longer acquainted with their districts, bishops with their dioceses, or curates with their parishes. These new colonies of the rights of men bear a strong resemblance to that fort of military colonies which Tacitus has observed upon in the declining policy of Rome. In better and wifer days (whatever courfe they took with foreign nations) they were careful to make the elements of a methodical fubordination and fettlement to be coeval; and even to lay the foundations of civil discipline in the military*. But, when all the good arts had fallen into ruin, they proceeded,

^{*} Non, ut olim, universæ legiones deducebantur cum tribunis, et centurionibus, et sui cujusque ordinis militibus, ut consensu et caritate rempublicam afficerent; sed ignoti inter se, diversis manipulis, sine rectore, sine affectibus mutuis, quasi ex alio genere mortalium, repente in unum collecti, numerus magis quam colonia. Tac. Annal, l. 14. sect. 27. All this will be still more applicable to the unconnected, rotatory, biennial national affemblies, in this absurd and senseless constitution.

proceeded, as your affembly does, upon the equality of men, and with as little judgment, and as little care for those things which make a republic tolerable or durable. But in this, as well as almost every instance, your new commonwealth is born, and bred, and fed, in those corruptions which mark degenerated and worn out republics. Your child comes into the world with the symptoms of death; the facies Hippocratica forms the character of its physiognomy, and the prognostic of its fate.

The legislators who framed the antient republics knew that their business was too arduous to be accomplished with no better apparatus than the metaphysics of an under-graduate, and the mathematics and arithmetic of an exciseman. They had to do with men, and they were obliged to fludy human nature. They had to do with citizens, and they were obliged to study the effects of those habits which are communicated by the circumstances of civil life. They were sensible that the operation of this fecond nature on the first produced a new combination; and thence arose many diversities amongst men, according to their birth. their education, their professions, the periods of their lives, their refidence in towns or in the country, their feveral ways of acquiring and of fixing property, and according to the quality of the property itself, all which rendered them as it were fo many different species of animals. From hence they thought themselves obliged to dispose their citizens into fuch classes, and to place them in fuch fituations in the state as their peculiar habits might qualify them to fill, and to allot to them fuch appropriated propriated privileges as might fecure to them what their specific occasions required, and which might furnish to each description such force as might protect it in the conflict caused by the diversity of interests, that must exist, and must contend in all complex fociety: for the legislator would have been ashamed, that the coarse husbandman should well know how to affort and to use his fheep, horses, and oxen, and should have enough of common fense not to abstract and equalize them all into animals, without providing for each kind an appropriate food, care, and employment; whilft he, the œconomist, disposer, and shepherd of his own kindred, fubliming himself into an airy metaphysician, was resolved to know nothing of his flocks, but as men in general. It is for this reason that Montesquieu observed very justly, that in their classification of the citizens, the great legislators of antiquity made the greatest display of their powers, and even foared above themselves. It is here that your modern legislators have gone deep into the negative feries, and funk even below their own nothing. As the first fort of legislators attended to the different kinds of citizens, and combined them into one commonwealth, the others, the metaphyfical and alchemistical legislators, have taken the direct contrary course. They have attempted to confound all forts of citizens, as well as they could, into one homogeneous mass; and then they divided this their amalgama into a number of incoherent republics. They reduce men to loofe counters merely for the fake of fimple telling, and not to figures whose power is to arife of their own metaphysics might have taught them better lessons. The troll of their categorical table might have informed them that there was something else in the intellectual world besides substance and quantity. They might learn from the catechism of metaphysics that there were eight heads more *, in every complex deliberation, which they have never thought of, though these, of all the ten, are the subject on which the skill of man can operate any thing at all.

So far from this able difpolition of some of the old republican legislators, which follows with a folicitous accuracy, the moral conditions and propenfities of men, they have levelled and crushed together all the orders which they found, even under the coarfe unartificial arrangement of the monarchy, in which mode of government the claffing of the citizens is not of fo much importance as in a republic. It is true, however, that every fuch claffification, if properly ordered, is good in all forms of government; and composes a strong barrier against the excesses of despotism, as well as it is the necessary means of giving effect and permanence to a republic. For want of something of this kind, if the present project of a republic should fail, all fecurities to a moderated freedom fail along with it; all the indirect reflraints which mitigate despotism are removed; infomuch that if monarchy should ever again obtain an entire ascendency in France, under this or under any other dynasty, it will probably be, if not voluntarily tempered at setting out, by the wise and virtuous counsels of the prince, the most completely arbitrary power that has ever appeared on earth. This is to play a most desperate game.

The confusion, which attends on all such proceedings, they even declare to be one of their objects. and they hope to fecure their constitution by a terror of a return of those evils which attended their making it. "By this," fay they, "its destruction will become difficult to authority, which cannot "break it up without the entire diforganization of "the whole state." They presume, that if this authority should ever come to the same degree of power that they have acquired, it would make a more moderate and chaftised use of it, and would piously tremble entirely to diforganise the state in the favage manner that they have done. They expect, from the virtues of returning despotism, the fecurity which is to be enjoyed by the offspring of their popular vices.

I wish, Sir, that you and my readers would give an attentive perusal to the work of M. de Calonne, on this subject. It is indeed not only an eloquent but an able and instructive performance. I confine myself to what he says relative to the constitution of the new state, and to the condition of the revenue. As to the disputes of this minister with his rivals, I do not wish to pronounce upon them. As sittle do I mean to hazard any opinion concerning his ways and means, financial or political, for taking taking his country out of its present disgraceful and deplorable fituation of fervitude, anarchy, bankruptcy, and beggary. I cannot speculate quite so fanguinely as he does: but he is a Frenchman, and has a closer duty relative to those objects, and better means of judging of them, than I can have. I wish that the formal avowal which he refers to, made by one of the principal leaders in the affembly, concerning the tendency of their scheme to bring France not only from a monarchy to a republic, but from a republic to a mere confederacy, may be very particularly attended to. It adds new force to my obfervations; and indeed M. de Calonne's work fupplies my deficiencies by many new and flriking arguments on most of the subjects of this Letter *.

It is this resolution, to break their country into feparate republics, which has driven them into the greatest number of their difficulties and contradictions. If it were not for this, all the questions of exact equality, and these balances, never to be fettled, of individual rights, population, and contribution, would be wholly useless. The representation, though derived from parts, would be a duty which equally regarded the whole. Each deputy to the affembly would be the repreientative of France, and of all its descriptions, of the many and of the few, of the rich and of the poor, of the great diftricts and of the small. All these districts would themselves be subordinate to some standing authority, existing independently of them; an authority in which their representation, and every thing that belongs to it, originated, and to which it was pointed. This standing, unalterable, fundamental government would make, and it is the only thing which could make, that territory truly and properly an whole. With us, when we elect popular reprefentatives, we fend them to a council, in which each man individually is a subject, and submitted to a government complete in all its ordinary functions. With you the elective affembly is the fovereign, and the fole fovereign: all the members are therefore integral parts of this fole fovereignty. But with us it is totally different. With us the reprefentative, feparated from the other parts, can have no action and no existence. The government is the point of reference of the feveral members and districts of our representation. This is the center of our unity. This government of reference is a truftee for the whole, and not for the parts. So is the other branch of our public council, I mean the house of lords. With us the king and the lords are feveral and joint fecurities for the equality of each diffrict, each province, each city. When did you hear in Great Britain of any province fuffering from the inequality of its representation; what district from having no representation at all? Not only our monarchy and our peerage fecure the equality on which our unity depends, but it is the spirit of the house of commons itself. The very inequality of reprefentation, which is fo foolifhly complained of, is perhaps the very thing which prevents us from thinking or acting as members for districts. Cornwall elects as many members as all Scotland. But is Cornwall better taken care of than Scotland?

* See L'Etat de la France, p. 363.

Few trouble their heads about any of your bases, out of some giddy clubs. Most of those, who wish for any change, upon any plausible grounds, desire it on different ideas.

Your new constitution is the very reverse of ours in its principle; and I am aftonished how any perfons could dream of holding out any thing done in it as an example for Great Britain. With you there is little, or rather no, connection between the last representative and the first constituent. The member who goes to the national affembly is not chosen by the people, nor accountable to them. There are three elections before he is cholen: two fets of magistracy intervene between him and the primary affembly, fo as to render him, as I have faid, an ambaffador of a ftate, and not the reprefentative of the people within a state. By this the whole spirit of the election is changed; nor can any corrective your constitution-mongers have devifed render him any thing else than what heis. The very attempt to do it would inevitably introduce a confusion, if possible, more horrid than the present. There is no way to make a connexion between the original constituent and the representative, but by the circuitous means which may lead the candidate to apply in the first instance to the primary electors, in order that by their authoritative instructions (and fomething more perhaps) these primary electors may force the two fucceeding bodies of electors to make a choice agreeable to their wishes. But this would plainly fubvert the whole scheme. It would be to plunge them back into that tumult and confusion of popular election, which, by

by their interposed gradation elections, they mean to avoid, and at length to risque the whole fortune of the state with those who have the least knowledge of it, and the least interest in it. This is a perpetual dilemma, into which they are thrown by the vicious, weak, and contradictory principles they have chosen. Unless the people break up and level this gradation, it is plain that they do not at all substantially elect to the assembly; indeed they elect as little in appearance as reality.

What is it we all feek for in an election? To answer its real purposes, you must first possess the means of knowing the fitness of your man; and then you must retain some hold upon him by perfonal obligation or dependence. For what end are these primary electors complimented, or rather mocked, with a choice? They can never know any thing of the qualities of him that is to ferve them, nor has he any obligation whatfoever to them. Of all the powers unfit to be delegated by those who have any real means of judging, that most peculiarly unfit is what relates to a personal choice. In case of abuse, that body of primary electors never can call the reprefentative to an account for his conduct. He is too far removed from them in the chain of representation. If he acts improperly at the end of his two years leafe, it does not concern him for two years more. By the new French conflitution, the best and the wifest representatives go equally with the worst into this Limbus Patrum. Their bottoms are supposed foul, and they must go into dock to be refitted. Every man who has ferved in an affembly is ineligible for two years after. after. Just as these magistrates begin to learn their trade, like chimney-sweepers, they are disqualified for exercising it. Superficial, new, petulant acquisition, and interrupted, dronish, broken, ill recollection, is to be the destined character of all your future governors. Your constitution has too much of jealousy to have much of sense in it. You consider the breach of trust in the representative so principally, that you do not at all regard the question of his situes to execute it.

This purgatory interval is not unfavourable to a faithless representative, who may be as good a canvasser as he was a bad governor. In this time he may cabal himself into a superiority over the wisest and most virtuous. As, in the end, all the members of this elective constitution are equally sugitive, and exist only for the election, they may be no longer the same persons who had chosen him, to whom he is to be responsible when he solicits for a renewal of his trust. To call all the secondary electors of the Commune to account, is ridiculous, impracticable, and unjust; they may themselves have been deceived in their choice, as the third set of electors, those of the Department, may be in theirs. In your elections responsibility cannot exist.

Finding no fort of principle of coherence with each other in the nature and conflictation of the feveral new republics of France, I confidered what cement the legislators had provided for them from any extraneous materials. Their confederations, their spectacles, their civic feafts, and their enthusiasm, I take no notice of; They are nothing but mere tricks; but tracing their policy through their T 4 actions, I think I can diftinguish the arrangements by which they propose to hold these republics together. The first, is the confiscation, with the compulsory paper currency annexed to it; the second, is the supreme power of the city of Paris; the third, is the general army of the state. Of this last I shall reserve what I have to say, until I come to consider the army as an head by itself.

As to the operation of the first (the confifcation and paper currency) merely as a cement, I cannot deny that these, the one depending on the other, may for fome time compose some fort of cement, if their madness and folly in the management, and in the tempering of the parts together, does not produce a repulsion in the very outfet. But allowing to the scheme fome coherence and fome duration, it appears to me, that if, after a while, the confiscation should not be found sufficient to support the paper coinage (as I am morally certain it will not) then, instead of cementing, it will add infinitely to the diffociation, distraction, and confusion of these confederate republics, both with relation to each other, and to the feveral parts within themselves. But if the confiscation should so far succeed as to fink the paper currency, the cement is gone with the circulation. In the mean time its binding force will be very uncertain, and it will straiten or relax with every variation in the credit of the paper.

One thing only is certain in this scheme, which is an effect seemingly collateral, but direct, I have no doubt, in the minds of those who conduct this business; that is, its effect in producing an Oligarchy

garchy in every one of the republics. A paper circulation, not founded on any real money deposited or engaged for, amounting already to four-and-forty millions of English money, and this currency by force substituted in the place of the coin of the kingdom, becoming thereby the substance of its revenue, as well as the medium of all its commercial and civil intercourse, must put the whole of what power, authority, and influence is left, in any form whatsoever it may assume, into the hands of the managers and conductors of this circulation.

In England we feel the influence of the bank: though it is only the center of a voluntary dealing. He knows little indeed of the influence of money upon mankind, who does not fee the force of the management of a monied concern, which is fo much more extensive, and in its nature so much more depending on the managers than any of ours. But this is not merely a money concern. There is another member in the fystem inseparably connected with this money management. It confifts in the means of drawing out at discretion portions of the confiscated lands for fale; and carrying on a process of continual transmutation of paper into land, and land into paper. When we follow this process in its effects, we may conceive fomething of the intenfity of the force with which this fystem must operate. By this means the spirit of money-jobbing and speculation goes into the mass of land itself, and incorporates with it. By this kind of operation, that fpecies of property becomes (as it were) volatilized; it affumes an unnatural and monftrous activity, and thereby thereby throws into the hands of the feveral managers, principal and fubordinate, Parifian and provincial, all the representative of money, and perhaps a full tenth part of all the land in France, which has now acquired the worst and most pernicious part of the evil of a paper circulation, the greatest possible uncertainty in its value. They have reversed the Latonian kindness to the landed property of Delos. They have sent theirs to be blown about, like the light fragments of a wreck, oras et littora circum.

The new dealers being all habitually adventurers, and without any fixed habits or local predilections, will purchase to job out again, as the market of paper, or of money, or of land shall prefent an advantage. For though an holy bishop thinks that agriculture will derive great advantages from the "enlightened" usurers who are to purchase the church confiscations, I, who am not a good, but an old farmer, with great humility beg leave to tell his late lordship, that usury is not a tutor of agriculture; and if the word " enlightened" be understood according to the new dictionary, as it always is in your new schools, I cannot conceive how a man's not believing in God can teach him to cultivate the earth with the least of any additional skill or encouragement. " Diis immortalibus fero," faid an old Roman, when he held one handle of the plough, whilft Death held the other. Though you were to join in the commission all the directors of the two academies to the directors of the Caiffe d'Escompte, one old experienced peafant is worth them all. I have got more information, upon a curious and interefting branch of hufbandry, in one fhort conversation with a Carthusian monk, than I have derived from all the Bank directors that I have ever conversed with. However, there is no cause for apprehension from the meddling of money-dealers with rural economy. These gentlemen are too wise in their generation. At first, perhaps, their tender and susceptible imaginations may be captivated with the innocent and unprofitable delights of a pastoral life; but in a little time they will find that agriculture is a trade much more laborious, and much less lucrative than that which they had lest. After making its panegyric, they will turn their backs on it like their great precursor and prototype.—They may, like him, begin by singing "Beatus ille"—but what will be the end?

Sic cum locutus fænerator Alphius,
fam jam futurus rusticus
Omnem relegit idibus pecuniam,
Quærit calendis ponere.

They will cultivate the caiffe d'Eglise, under the facred auspices of this prelate, with much more profit than its vineyards or its corn-fields. They will employ their talents according to their habits and their interests. They will not follow the plough whilst they can direct treasuries, and govern provinces.

Your legislators, in every thing new, are the very first who have founded a commonwealth upon gaming, and infused this spirit into it as its vital breath. The great object in these politics is to metamorphose France, from a great kingdom into one great play-table; to turn its inhabitants into a nation of gamesters; to make speculation as extensive as life; to mix it with all its concerns; and to divert the whole of the hopes and fears of the people from their usual channels, into the impulses, passions, and superstitions of those who live on chances. They loudly proclaim their opinion, that this their prefent fystem of a republic cannot possibly exist without this kind of gaming fund; and that the very thread of its life is fpun out of the staple of these speculations. The old gaming in funds was mischievous enough undoubtedly; but it was fo only to individuals. Even when it had its greatest extent, in the Mississippi and South Sea, it affected but few, comparatively; where it extends further, as in lotteries, the spirit has but a fingle object. But where the law, which in most circumstances forbids, and in none countenances gaming, is itself debauched, so as to reverse its nature and policy, and expressly to force the subject to this destructive table, by bringing the spirit and fymbols of gaming into the minutest matters, and engaging every body in it, and in every thing, a more dreadful epidemic diftemper of that kind is spread than yet has appeared in the world. With you a man can neither earn nor buy his dinner, without a fpeculation. What he receives in the morning will not have the same value at night. What he is compelled to take as pay for an old debt, will not be received as the fame when he is to contract a new one; nor will it be the fame when by prompt payment he would avoid contracting any debt at all. Industry must wither away. Œconomy must be driven from your country. Careful provision will have no exiftence. Who will labour without knowing the amount amount of his pay? Who will study to encrease what none can estimate? who will accumulate, when he does not know the value of what he saves? If you abstract it from its uses in gaming, to accumulate your paper wealth, would be not the providence of a man, but the distempered instinct of a jackdaw.

The truly melancholy part of the policy of systematically making a nation of gamesters is this: that tho' all are forced to play, few can understand the game; and fewer still are in a condition to avail themselves of the knowledge. The many must be the dupes of the few who conduct the machine of these speculations. What effect it must have on the country-people is visible. The townsman can calculate from day to day: not fo the inhabitant of the country. When the peafant first brings his corn to market, the magistrate in the towns obliges him to take the affignat at par; when he goes to the shop with this money, he finds it feven per cent, the worse for croffing the way. This market he will not readily refort to again. The towns-people will be inflamed! they will force the country-people to bring their corn. Refistance will begin, and the murders of Paris and St. Dennis may be renewed through all France.

What fignifies the empty compliment paid to the country by giving it perhaps more than its share in the theory of your representation? Where have you placed the real power over monied and landed circulation? Where have you placed the means of raising and falling the value of every man's freehold? Those whose operations can take from,

from, or add ten per cent. to, the possessions of every man in France, must be the masters of every man in France. The whole of the power obtained by this revolution will fettle in the towns among the burghers, and the monied directors who lead them. The landed gentleman, the yeoman, and the peafant have, none of them, habits, or inclinations, or experience, which can lead them to any fhare in this the fole fource of power and influence nowleft in France. The very nature of a country life, the very nature of landed property, in all the occupations, and all the pleasures they afford, render combination and arrangement (the fole way of procuring and exerting influence) in a manner impossible amongst country-people. Combine them by all the art you can, and all the industry, they are always diffolving into individuality. Any thing in the nature of incorporation is almost impracticable amongst them. Hope, fear, alarm, jealousy, the ephemerous tale that does its business and dies in a day, all thefe things, which are the reins and fours by which leaders check or urge the minds of followers, are not easily employed, or hardly at all, amongst scattered people. They affemble, they arm, they act with the utmost difficulty, and at the greatest charge. Their efforts, if ever they can be commenced, cannot be fuftained. They cannot proceed fystematically. If the country gentlemen attempt an influence through the mere income of their property, what is it to that of those who have ten times their income to fell, and who can ruin their property by bringing their plunder to meet it at market. If the landed man wishes to mortgage, he he falls the value of his land, and raifes the value of affignats. He augments the power of his enemy by the very means he must take to contend with him. The country gentleman therefore, the officer by fea and land, the man of liberal views and habits, attached to no profession, will be as completely excluded from the government of his country as if he were legislatively proscribed. It is obvious, that in the towns, all the things which conspire against the country gentleman, combine in favour of the money manager and director. In towns combination is natural. The habits of burghers, their occupations, their diversion, their business. their idlenefs, continually bring them into mutual contact. Their virtues and their vices are fociable: they are always in garrifon; and they come embodied and half disciplined into the hands of those who mean to form them for civil, or for military action.

All these considerations leave no doubt on my mind, that if this monster of a constitution can continue, France will be wholly governed by the agitators in corporations, by societies in the towns formed of directors of assignats, and trustees for the sale of church lands, attornies, agents, money-jobbers, speculators, and adventurers, composing an ignoble oligarchy founded on the destruction of the crown, the church, the nobility, and the people. Here end all the deceitful dreams and visions of the equality and rights of men. In "the Serbonian bog" of this base oligarchy they are all absorbed, sunk, and lost for ever.

Though

Though human eyes cannot trace them, one would be tempted to think some great offences in France must cry to heaven, which has thought fit to punish it with a subjection to a vile and inglorious domination, in which no comfort or compensation is to be found in any, even of those false splendours, which, playing about other tyrannies, prevent mankind from feeling themselves dishonoured even whilst they are oppressed. I must confess I am touched with a forrow, mixed with fome indignation, at the conduct of a few men, once of great rank, and still of great character, who, deluded with specious names, have engaged in a business too deep for the line of their understanding to fathom; who have lent their fair reputation, and the authority of their high-founding names, to the defigns of men with whom they could not be acquainted; and have thereby made their very virtues operate to the ruin of their country.

So far as to the first cementing principle.

The second material of cement for their new republic is the superiority of the city of Paris; and this I admit is strongly connected with the other cementing principle of paper circulation and confiscation. It is in this part of the project we must look for the cause of the destruction of all the old bounds of provinces and jurisdictions, ecclesiastical and secular, and the dissolution of all ancient combinations of things, as well as the formation of some many small unconnected republics. The power of the city of Paris is evidently one great spring of all their politics. It is through the power of Paris, now become the center and socus of

of jobbing, that the leaders of this faction dia rect, or rather command the whole legislative and the whole executive government. Every thing therefore must be done which can confirm the authority of that city over the other republics. Paris is compact; she has an enormous strength, wholly disproportioned to the force of any of the square republics; and this strength is collected and condenfed within a narrow compass. Paris has a natural and easy connexion of its parts, which will not be affected by any scheme of a geometrical constitution, nor does it much fignify whether its proportion of representation be more or less, fince it has the whole draft of fishes in its dragnet. The other divisions of the kingdom being hackled and torn to pieces, and separated from all their habitual means, and even principles of union, cannot, for fome time at least, confederate against her. Nothing was to be left in all the fubordinate members, but weakness, disconnection, and confufion. To confirm this part of the plan, the affembly has lately come to a refolution, that no two of their republics shall have the same commander in chief.

To a person who takes a view of the whole, the strength of Paris thus formed, will appear a system of general weakness. It is boasted, that the geometrical policy has been adopted, that all local ideas should be sunk, and that the people should no longer be Gascons, Picards, Bretons, Normans, but Frenchmen, with one country, one heart, and one assembly. But instead of being all Frenchmen, the greater likelihood is, that the inhabitants of that region will shortly have no country. No man ever was attached by a fense of pride, partiality, or real affection, to a description of square measurement. He never will glory in belonging to the Checquer, Nº 71, or to any other badge-ticket. We begin our public affections in our families. No cold relation is a zealous citizen. We pass on to our neighbourhoods, and our habitual provincial connections. These are inns and resting-places. Such divisions of our country as have been formed by habit, and not by a fudden jerk of authority, were fo many little images of the great country in which the heart found fomething which it could fill. The love to the whole is not extinguished by this subordinate partiality. Perhaps it is a fort of elemental training to those higher and more large regards, by which alone men come to be affected, as with their own concern, in the profperity of a kingdom fo extensive as that of France. In that general territory itself, as in the old name of provinces, the citizens are interested from old prejudices and unreasoned habits, and not on account of the geometric properties of its figure. The power and preeminence of Paris does certainly press down and hold these republics together, as long as it lasts. But, for the reasons I have already given you, I think it cannot last very long.

Passing from the civil creating, and the civil cementing principles of this constitution, to the national assembly, which is to appear and act as sovereign, we see a body in its constitution with every possible power, and no possible external controul. We see a body without fundamental laws, without established maxims, without respected rules of proceeding, which nothing can keep firm to any fystem whatsoever. Their idea of their powers is always taken at the utmost stretch of legislative competency, and their examples for common cases, from the exceptions of the most urgent necessity. The future is to be in most respects like the present assembly; but, by the mode of the new elections and the tendency of the new circulations, it will be purged of the small degree of internal controul existing in a minority chosen originally from various interests, and preserving something of their spirit. If possible, the next affembly must be worse than the present. The present, by destroying and altering every thing, will leave to their fuccessors apparently nothing popular to do. They will be roufed by emulation and example to enterprifes the boldest and the most abfurd. To suppose such an assembly sitting in perfect quietude is ridiculous.

Your all-fufficient legislators, in their hurry to do every thing at once, have forgot one thing that feems effential, and which, I believe, never has been before, in the theory or the practice, omitted by any projector of a republic. They have forgot to constitute a Senate, or something of that nature and character. Never, before this time, was heard of a body politic composed of one legislative and active affembly, and its executive officers, without fuch a council; without fomething to which foreign states might connect themselves; something to which, in the ordinary detail of government, the people could look up; fomething which might give a bias and fteadiness, and preserve something like confiftency U 2 consistency in the proceedings of state. Such a body kings generally have as a council. A monarchy may exist without it; but it seems to be in the very essence of a republican government. It holds a fort of middle place between the supreme power exercised by the people, or immediately delegated from them, and the mere executive. Of this there are no traces in your constitution; and in providing nothing of this kind, your Solons and Numas have, as much as in any thing else, discovered a fovereign incapacity.

Let us now turn our eyes to what they have done towards the formation of an executive power. For this they have chosen a degraded king. This their first executive officer is to be a machine, without any fort of deliberative difcretion in any one act of his function. At best he is but a channel to convey to the national affembly fuch matter as may import that body to know. If he had been made the exclusive channel, the power would not have been without its importance; though infinitely perilous to those who would choose to exercise it. But public intelligence and statement of facts may pass to the affembly, with equal authenticity, through any other conveyance. As to the means, therefore, of giving a direction to measures by the statement of an authorized reporter, this office of intelligence is as nothing.

To consider the French scheme of an executive officer in its two natural divisions of civil and political—In the first it must be observed, that, according to the new constitution, the higher parts of judicature, in either of its lines, are not in the king. The king of France is not the fountain of justice. The judges, neither the original nor the appellate, are of his nomination. He neither proposes the candidates, nor has a negative on the choice. He is not even the public profecutor. He ferves only as a notary to authenticate the choice made of the judges in the feveral districts. By his officers he is to execute their fentence. When we look into the true nature of his authority, he appears to be nothing more than a chief of bumbailiffs, ferjeants at mace, catchpoles, jailers, and hangmen. It is impossible to place any thing called royalty in a more degrading point of view. A thousand times better it had been for the dignity of this unhappy prince, that he had nothing at all to do with the administration of justice, deprived as he is of all that is venerable, and all that is confolatory in that function, without power of originating any process; without a power of suspension, mitigation, or pardon. Every thing in justice that is vile and odious is thrown upon him. It was not for nothing that the affembly has been at fuch pains to remove the stigma from certain offices, when they were refolved to place the person who lately had been their king in a fituation but one degree above the executioner, and in an office nearly of the same quality. It is not in nature, that fituated as the king of the French now is, he can respect himself, or can be respected by others.

View this new executive officer on the fide of his political capacity, as he acts under the orders of the national affembly. To execute laws is a royal office; to execute orders is not to be a king. However, a political executive magistracy, though merely fuch, is a great trust. It is a trust indeed that has much depending upon its faithful and diligent performance, both in the perfon prefiding in it and in all his fubordinates. Means of performing this duty ought to be given by regulation; and dispositions towards it ought to be infused by the circumstances attendant on the truft. It ought to be environed with dignity, authority, and confideration, and it ought to lead to glory. The office of execution is an office of exertion. It is not from impotence we are to expect the talks of power. What fort of person is a king to command executory fervice, who has no means whatfoever to reward it? Not in a permanent office; not in a grant of land; no, not in a pension of fifty pounds a year; not in the vainest and most trivial title. In France the king is no more the fountain of honour than he is the fountain of justice. All rewards, all diffinctions are in other hands. Those who serve the king can be actuated by no natural motive but fear; by a fear of every thing except their mafter. His functions of internal coercion are as odious, as those which he exercises in the department of justice. If relief is to be given to any municipality, the affembly gives it. If troops are to be fent to reduce them to obedience to the affembly, the king is to execute the order; and upon every occasion he is to be spattered over with the blood of his people. He has no negative; yet his name and authority is used to enforce every harfh harsh decree. Nay, he must concur in the butchery of those who shall attempt to free him from his imprisonment, or shew the slightest attachment to his person or to his antient authority.

Executive magistracy ought to be constituted in fuch a manner, that those who compose it should be disposed to love and to venerate those whom they are bound to obey. A purposed neglect, or, what is worse, a literal but perverse and malignant obedience, must be the ruin of the wifest counsels. In vain will the law attempt to anticipate or to follow fuch studied neglects and fraudulent atten-To make men act zealoufly is not in the competence of law. Kings, even fuch as are truly kings, may and ought to bear the freedom of fubjects that are obnoxious to them. They may too, without derogating from themselves. bear even the authority of fuch persons if it promotes their fervice. Louis the XIIIth mortally hated the cardinal de Richlieu; but his support of that minister against his rivals was the source of all the glory of his reign, and the folid foundation of his throne itself. Louis the XIVth, when come to the throne, did not love the cardinal Mazarin; but for his interests he preserved him in power. When old, he detefted Louvois; but for years, whilft he faithfully ferved his greatness, he endured his person. When George the IId took Mr. Pitt, who certainly was not agreeable to him, into his councils, he did nothing which could humble a wife fovereign. But these ministers, who were chosen by affairs, not by affections, acted in the name of, and in trust for, kings; and not as their avowed, U4 avowed, conflitutional, and oftenfible mafters. I think it impossible that any king, when he has recovered his first terrors, can cordially infuse vivacity and vigour into measures which he knows to be dictated by those who he must be perfuaded are in the highest degree ill affected to his person. Will any ministers, who serve such a king (or whatever he may be called) with but a decent appearance of respect, cordially obey the orders of those whom but the other day in his name they had committed to the Bastile? will they obey the orders of those whom, whilst they were exercising despotic justice upon them, they conceived they were treating with lenity; and for whom, in a prifon, they thought they had provided an afylum? If you expect fuch obedience, amongst your other innovations and regenerations, you ought to make a revolution in nature, and provide a new conflitution for the human mind. Otherwise, your fupreme government cannot harmonize with its executory fystem. There are cases in which we cannot take up with names and abstractions. You may call half a dozen leading individuals, whom we have reason to fear and hate, the nation. It makes no other difference, than to make us fear and hate them the more. If it had been thought juftifiable and expedient to make fuch a revolution by fuch means, and through fuch perfons, as you have made yours, it would have been more wife to have completed the buliness of the fifth and fixth of October. The new executive officer would then owe his fituation to those who are his creators as well as his mafters; and he might be bound bound in interest, in the society of crime, and (if in crimes there could be virtues) in gratitude, to serve those who had promoted him to a place of great lucre and great sensual indulgence; and of something more; For more he must have received from those who certainly would not have limited an aggrandized creature, as they have done a fubmitting antagonist.

A king circumstanced as the present, if he is totally stupisfied by his misfortunes, so as to think it not the necessity, but the premium and privilege of life, to eat and fleep, without any regard to glory, never can be fit for the office. If he feels as men commonly feel, he must be fensible, that an office fo circumftanced is one in which he can obtain no fame or reputation. He has no generous interest that can excite him to action. At best, his conduct will be paffive and defensive. To inferior people fuch an office might be matter of honour. But to be raifed to it, and to descend to it, are different things, and fuggest different sentiments. Does he really name the ministers? They will have a sympathy with him. Are they forced upon him? The whole business between them and the nominal king will be mutual counteraction. In all other countries, the office of ministers of state is of the highest dignity. In France it is full of peril and incapable of glory. Rivals however they will have in their nothingness, whilst shallow ambition exists in the world, or the defire of a miferable falary is an incentive to short-fighted avarice. Those competitors of the ministers are enabled by your constitution to attack them in their vital parts, whilft they have not the means of repelling their charges in any other than the degrading character of culprits. The ministers of state in France are the only persons in that country who are incapable of a share in the national councils. What ministers! What councils! What a nation!-But they are responfible. It is a poor fervice that is to be had from responsibility. The elevation of mind, to be derived from fear, will never make a nation glorious. Responsibility prevents crimes. It makes all attempts against the laws dangerous. But for a principle of active and zealous fervice, none but idiots could think of it. Is the conduct of a war to be trufted to a man who may abhor its principle; who, in every step he may take to render it fuccessful, confirms the power of those by whom he is oppressed? Will foreign states feriously treat with him who has no prerogative of peace or war; no, not fo much as in a fingle vote by himself or his ministers, or by any one whom he can possibly influence. A state of contempt is not a state for a prince: better get rid of him at once.

I know it will be faid, that these humours in the court and executive government will continue only through this generation; and that the king has been brought to declare the dauphin shall be educated in a conformity to his situation. If he is made to conform to his situation, he will have no education at all. His training must be worse even than that of an arbitrary monarch. If he reads,—whether he reads or not, some good or evil genius will tell him his ancestors were kings.

Thenceforward

Thenceforward his object must be to affert himfelf, and to avenge his parents. This you will say is not his duty. That may be; but it is Nature;
and whilst you pique Nature against you, you do unwisely to trust to Duty. In this sutile scheme of polity, the state nurses in its bosom, for the present, a source of weakness, perplexity, counteraction, inessiciency, and decay; and it prepares the means of its final ruin. In short, I see nothing in the executive force (I cannot call it authority) that has even an appearance of vigour, or that has the smallest degree of just correspondence or symmetry, or amicable relation, with the supreme power, either as it now exists, or as it is planned for the future government.

You have fettled, by an ceconomy as perverted as the policy, two * establishments of government; one real, one fictitious. Both maintained at a vast expence; but the fictitious at, I think, the greatest. Such a machine as the latter is not worth the greafe of its wheels. The expence is exorbitant; and neither the fhew nor the use deserve the tenth part of the charge. Oh! but I don't do justice to the talents of the legislators. I don't allow, as I ought to do, for necessity. Their scheme of executive force was not their choice. This pageant must be kept. The people would not confent to part with it. Right; I understand you. You do, in spite of your grand theories, to which you would have heaven and earth to bend, you do know how to conform yourselves to the nature and circumstances of things. But when you were obliged to conform thus far to circumstances, you ought to have carried your fubmission farther, and to have made what you were obliged to take, a proper instrument, and useful to its end. That was in your power. For instance, among many others, it was in your power to leave to your king the right of peace and war, What! to leave to the executive magistrate the most dangerous of all prerogatives? I know none more dangerous; nor any one more necessary to be so trusted. I do not say that this prerogative ought to be trusted to your king, unless he enjoyed other auxiliary trusts along with it, which he does not now hold. But, if he did poffess them, hazardous as they are undoubtedly, advantages would arise from such constitution, more than compensating the risque. There is no other way of keeping the feveral potentates of Europe from intriguing distinctly and personally with the members of your affembly, from intermeddling in all your concerns, and fomenting, in the heart of your country, the most pernicious of all factions; factions in the interest and under the direction of foreign powers. From that worst of evils, thank God, we are still free. Your skill, if you had any, would be well employed to find out indirect correctives and controls upon this perilous trust. If you did not like those which in England we have chosen, your leaders might have exerted their abiliries in contriving better. If it were necessary to exemplify the consequences of fuch an executive government as yours, in the management of great affairs. affairs, I should refer you to the late reports of M. de Montmorin to the national affembly, and all the other proceedings relative to the differences between Great Britain and Spain. It would be treating your understanding with difrespect to point them out to you.

I hear that the persons who are called ministers have fignified an intention of refigning their places. I am rather aftonished that they have not refigned long fince. For the universe I would not have flood in the fituation in which they have been for this last twelvemonth. They wished well, I take it for granted, to the Revolution. Let this fact be as it may, they could not, placed as they were upon an eminence, though an eminence of humiliation, but be the first to see collectively, and to feel each in his own department, the evils which have been produced by that revolution. In every ftep which they took, or forbore to take, they must have felt the degraded situation of their country, and their utter incapacity of ferving it. They are in a species of subordinate servitude, in which no men before them were ever feen. Without confidence from their fovereign, on whom they were forced, or from the affembly who forced them upon him, all the noble functions of their office are executed by committees of the affembly, without any regard whatfoever to their perfonal, or their official authority. They are to execute, without power; they are to be responsible. without discretion; they are to deliberate, without choice. In their puzzled fituation, under two fovereigns, over neither of whom they have any influence.

influence, they must act in such a manner as (in effect, whatever they may intend) sometimes to betray the one, sometimes the other, and always to betray themselves. Such has been their situation; such must be the situation of those who succeed them. I have much respect, and many good wishes, for Mr. Necker. I am obliged to him for attentions. I thought when his enemies had driven him from Versailles, that his exile was a subject of most serious congratulation—sed must e urbes et publica vota viceruni. He is now sitting on the ruins of the finances, and of the monarchy of France.

A great deal more might be observed on the strange constitution of the executory part of the new government; but fatigue must give bounds to the discussion of subjects, which in themselves have hardly any limits.

As little genius and talent am I able to perceive in the plan of judicature formed by the national affembly. According to their invariable course, the framers of your constitution have begun with the utter abolition of the parliaments. venerable bodies, like the rest of the old government, flood in need of reform, even though there should be no change made in the monarchy. They required feveral more alterations to adapt them to the fystem of a free constitution. But they had particulars in their constitution, and those not a few, which deferved approbation from the wife. They poffeffed one fundamental excellence; they were independent. The most doubtful circumstance attendant on their office, that of its being vendible, contributed however however to this independency of character. They held for life. Indeed they may be faid to have held by inheritance. Appointed by the monarch, they were confidered as nearly out of his power. The most determined exertions of that authority against them only shewed their radical independence. They composed permanent bodies politic, constituted to refift arbitrary innovation; and from that corporate constitution, and from most of their forms, they were well calculated to afford both certainty and ftability to the laws. They had been a fafe afylum to fecure thefe laws in all the revolutions of humour and opinion. They had faved that facred deposit of the country during the reigns of arbitrary princes. and the struggles of arbitrary factions. They kept alive the memory and record of the constitution. They were the great fecurity to private property; which might be faid (when perfonal liberty had no existence) to be, in fact, as well guarded in France as in any other country. Whatever is fupreme in a state, ought to have, as much as possible, its judicial authority fo conflituted as not only not to depend upon it, but in some fort to balance it. It ought to give a fecurity to its justice against its power. It ought to make its judicature, as it were, fomething exterior to the state.

These parliaments had furnished, not the best certainly, but some considerable corrective to the excesfes and vices of the monarchy. Such an independent judicature was ten times more necessary when a democracy became the absolute power of the country. In that constitution, elective, temporary, local judges, such as you have contrived, exercising their dependent dependent functions in a narrow fociety, must be the worst of all tribunals. In them it will be vain to look for any appearance of justice towards strangers, towards the obnoxious rich, towards the minority of routed parties, towards all those who in the election have supported unsuccessful candidates. It will be impossible to keep the new tribunals clear of the worst spirit of faction. All contrivances by ballot, we know experimentally, to be vain and childish to prevent a discovery of inclinations. Where they may the best answer the purposes of concealment, they answer to produce suspicion, and this is a still more mischievous cause of partiality.

If the parliaments had been preserved, instead of being diffolved at fo ruinous a change to the nation, they might have ferved in this new commonwealth, perhaps not precifely the fame (I do not mean an exact parallel) but near the fame purposes as the court and senate of Areopagus did in Athens; that is, as one of the balances and correctives to the evils of a light and unjust democracy. Every one knows, that this tribunal was the great stay of that state; every one knows with what care it was upheld, and with what a religious awe it was confecrated. The parliaments were not wholly free from faction, I admit; but this evil was exterior and accidental, and not fo much the vice of their constitution itself, as it must be in your new contrivance of sexennial elective judicatories. Several English commend the abolition of the old tribunals, as supposing that they determined every thing by bribery and corruption. ruption. But they have stood the test of monarchic and republican scrutiny. The court was well disposed to prove corruption on those bodies when they were dissolved in 1771.—Those who have again dissolved them would have done the same if they could—but both inquisitions having failed, I conclude, that gross pecuniary corruption must have been rather rare amongst them.

It would have been prudent, along with the parliaments, to preferve their antient power of registering, and of remonstrating at least, upon all the decrees of the national assembly, as they did upon those which passed in the time of the monarchy. It would be a means of squaring the occasional decrees of a democracy to some principles of general jurisprudence. The ruin of the antient democracies was, that they ruled, as you do, by occasional decrees, psepsismata. This practice soon broke in upon the tenour and consistency of the laws; they abated the respect of the people towards them; and totally destroyed them in the end.

Your vesting the power of remonstrance, which, in the time of the monarchy, existed in the parliament of Paris, in your principal executive officer, whom, in spite of common sense, you persevere in calling king, is the height of absurdity. You ought never to suffer remonstrance from him who is to execute. This is to understand neither council nor execution; neither authority nor obedience. The person whom you call king, ought not to have this power; or he ought to have more.

Your present arrangement is strictly judicial.

Instead of imitating your monarchy, and seating

your judges on a bench of independence, your object is to reduce them to the most blind obedience. As you have changed all things, you have invented new principles of order. You first appoint judges, who, I suppose, are to determine according to law, and then you let them know, that, at some time or other; you intend to give them fome law by which they are to determine. Any ftudies which they have made (if any they have made) are to be useless to them. But to supply these studies, they are to be sworn to obey all the rules, orders, and inftructions, which from time to time they are to receive from the national affembly. These if they submit to, they leave no ground of law to the fubject. They become complete, and most dangerous instruments in the hands of the governing power, which, in the midst of a cause, or on the prospect of it, may wholly change the rule of decision. If these orders of the National Asfembly come to be contrary to the will of the people who locally choose those judges, such consuston must happen as is terrible to think of. For the judges owe their place to the local authority; and the commands they are fworn to obey come from those who have no share in their appointment. In the mean time they have the example of the court of Chatelet to encourage and guide them in the exercise of their functions. That court is to try criminals fent to it by the National Affembly, or brought before it by other courses of delaction. They fit under a guard, to fave their own lives. They know not by what law they judge, nor under what authority they act, nor by what tenure they hold. It is thought that they are fometimes obliged to condemn at peril of their lives. This is not perhaps certain, nor can it be afcertained; but when they acquit, we know, they have feen the perfons whom they discharge, with perfect impunity to the actors, hanged at the door of their court.

The affembly indeed promifes that they will form a body of law, which shall be short, simple, clear, and so forth. That is, by their short laws, they will leave much to the discretion of the judge; whilst they have exploded the authority of all the learning which could make judicial discretion, (a thing perilous at best) deserving the appellation of

It is curious to observe, that the administrative bodies are carefully exempted from the jurisdiction of these new tribunals. That is, those persons are exempted from the power of the laws, who ought to be the most entirely submitted to them. Those who execute public pecuniary trufts, ought of all men to be the most strictly held to their duty. One would have thought, that it must have been among your earliest cares, if you did not mean that those administrative bodies should be real fovereign independent states, to form an awful tribunal, like your late parliaments, or like our king's-bench, where all corporate officers might obtain protection in the legal exercise of their functions, and would find coercion if they trespassed against their legal duty. But the cause of the exemption is plain. These administrative bodies are the great instruments of the present leaders in their progress through democracy to oligarchy. They must therefore be put above the law. It will be said, that the legal tribunals which you have made are unsit to coerce them. They are undoubtedly. They are unsit for any rational purpose. It will be said too, that the administrative bodies will be accountable to the general affembly. This I fear is talking, without much consideration, of the nature of that affembly or of these corporations. However, to be subject to the pleasure of that affembly, is not to be subject to law, either for protection or for constraint.

This establishment of judges as yet wants something to its completion. It is to be crowned by a new tribunal. This is to be a grand flate judicature; and it is to judge of crimes committed against the nation, that is, against the power of the affembly. It feems as if they had fomething in their view of the nature of the high court of justice erected in England during the time of the great usurpation. As they have not vet finished this part of the scheme, it is impossible to form a direct judgment upon it. However, if great care is not taken to form it in a spirit very different from that which has guided them in their proceedings relative to flate offences, this tribunal, subservient to their inquifition, the committee of refearch, will extinguish the last sparks of liberty in France, and fettle the most dreadful and arbitrary tyranny ever known in any nation. If they wish to give to this tribunal any appearance of liberty and justice, they must not evoke from, or send to it, the causes relative to their own members, at their pleasure. They must also remove the feat of that tribunal out of the republic of Paris *.

Has more wisdom been displayed in the constitution of your army than what is discoverable in your plan of judicature? The able arrangement of this part is the more difficult, and requires the greater skill and attention, not only as a great concern in itself, but as it is the third cementing principle in the new body of republics, which you call the French nation. Truly it is not eafy to divine what that army may become at last. You have voted a very large one, and on good appointments, at least fully equal to your apparent means of payment. But what is the principle of its discipline? or whom is it to obey? You have got the wolf by the ears, and I wish you joy of the happy position in which you have chosen to place yourselves, and in which you are well circumstanced for a free deliberation, relatively to that army, or to any thing else.

The minister and secretary of state for the war department, is M. de la Tour du Pin. This gentleman, like his colleagues in administration, is a most zealous affertor of the revolution, and a fanguine admirer of the new conflitution, which originated in that event. His statement of facts, relative to the military of France, is important, not only from his official and personal authority, but because it displays very clearly the actual condition of the army in France, and because it throws light on the principles upon which the affembly proceeds in the administration of this critical object. It may enable us to form some judgment how far it may be expedient in this country to imitate the martial policy of France.

M. de la Tour du Pin, on the 4th of last June, comes to give an account of the state of his department, as it exists under the auspices of the national affembly. No man knows it fo well; no man can express it better. Addressing himself to the National Affembly, he fays, "His Majesty " has this day fent me to apprize you of the mul-"tiplied diforders of which every day he receives "the most distressing intelligence. The army " (le corps militaire) threatens to fall into the most "turbulent anarchy. Entire regiments have dared " to violate at once the respect due to the laws, or to the King, to the order established by your "decrees, and to the oaths which they have taken " with the most awful folemnity. Compelled by " my duty to give you information of these ex-" ceffes, my heart bleeds when I confider who they " are that have committed them. Those, against "whom it is not in my power to withhold the " most grievous complaints, are a part of that " very foldiery which to this day have been fo " full of honour and loyalty, and with whom, for " fifty years, I have lived the comrade and the " " friend.

"What incomprehenfible spirit of delirium and " delufion has all at once led them aftray? Whilft wyou are indefarigable in establishing uniformity in " the empire, and moulding the whole into one co-W herent and confiftent body; whilft the French are " taught by you, at once the respect which the I laws owe to the rights of man, and that which " the citizens owe to the laws, the administration f of the army prefents nothing but difturbance and " confusion. I see in more than one corps the " bonds of discipline relaxed or broken; the most " unheard of pretentions avowed directly and without any difguife; the ordinances without force; "the chiefs without authority; the military cheft " and the colours carried off; the authority of " the King himfelf [rifum teneatis] proudly de-" fied; the officers despised, degraded, threatened, "driven away, and fome of them prisoners in the midst of their corps, dragging on a precarious life " in the bosom of disgust and humiliation. To fill " up the measure of all these horrors, the com-" mandants of places have had their throats cut, " under the eyes, and almost in the arms of their " own foldiers.

" herent

"These evils are great; but they are not the worst consequences which may be produced by such military insurrections. Sooner or later they may menace the nation itself. The nature of things requires, that the army should never act but as an instrument. The moment that, erecting itself into a deliberative body, it shall act according to its own resolutions, the government, be it what it may, will immediately degenerate into a military democracy; a species of political monster, which has always ended by de-

X 4 " After

"After all this, who must not be alarmed at the irregular consultations, and turbulent committees, formed in some regiments by the common soldiers and non-commissioned of ficers, without the knowledge, or even in contempt of the authority of their superiors; although the presence and concurrence of those superiors could give no authority to such monstrous democratic assemblies [comices.]"

It is not neteffary to add much to this finished picture: finished as far as its canvas admits; but, as I apprehend, not taking in the whole of the nature and complexity of the disorders of this military democracy, which, the minister at war truly and wisely observes, wherever it exists, must be the true constitution of the state, by whatever formal appellation it may pass. For, though he informs the assembly, that the more considerable part of the army have not cast off their obedience, but are still attached to their duty, yet those travellers who have seen the corps whose conduct is the best, rather observe in them the absence of mutiny than the existence of discipline.

I cannot help paufing here for a moment, to reflect upon the expressions of surprise which this Minister has let fall, relative to the excesses he relates. To him the departure of the troops from their antient principles of loyalty and honour seems quite inconceivable. Surely those to whom he addresses himself know the causes of it but too well. They know the doctrines which they have preached, the decrees which they have passed, the practices which they have countenanced. The foldiers remember the 6th of October. They recollect the French guards. They have not forgot the taking of the King's castles in Paris, and at Marseilles. That the governors in both places, were murdered with impunity, is a fact that has not paffed out of their minds. They do not abandon the principles laid down fo oftentatiously and laboriously of the equality of men. They cannot shut their eyes to the degradation of the whole nobleffe of France; and the suppression of the very idea of a gentleman. The total abolition of titles and diffinctions is not loft upon them. But Mr. du Pin is aftonished at their disloyalty, when the doctors of the affembly have taught them at the fame time the respect due to laws. It is easy to judge which of the two forts of leffons men with arms in their hands are likely to learn. As to the authority of the King, we may collect from the minister himfelf (if any argument on that head were not quite fuperfluous) that it is not of more confideration with these troops, than it is with every body else. "The King," fays he, "has over and over again repeated his orders to put a ftop to these excesses: but, in fo terrible a crifis your [the affembly's] concurrence is become indispensably necessary to prevent the evils which menace the state. You unite to the force of the legislative power, that of opinion still more important." To be sure the army can have no opinion of the power or authority of the king. Perhaps the foldier has by this time learned, that the affembly itself does pot enjoy a much greater degree of liberty than that royal figure.

It is now to be feen what has been proposed in this exigency, one of the greatest that can happen in a state. The Minister requests the assembly to array itself in all its terrors, and to call forth all its majesty. He desires that the grave and severe principles announced by them may give vigour to the King's proclamation. After this we should have looked for courts civil and martial; breaking of some corps, decimating others, and all the terrible means which necessity has employed in fuch cases to arrest the progress of the most terrible of all evils; particularly, one might expect, that a ferious inquiry would be made into the murder of commandants in the view of their foldiers. Not one word of all this, or of any thing like it. After they had been told that the foldiery trampled upon the decrees of the affembly promulgated by the King, the affembly pass new decrees; and they authorise the King to make new proclamations. After the Secretary at War had stated that the regiments had paid no regard to oaths prêtés avec la plus impofante folemnité - they propose-what? More oaths. They renew decrees and proclamations as they experience their infufficiency, and they multiply oaths in proportion as they weaken, in the minds of men, the fanctions of religion. I hope that handy abridgments of the excellent fermons of Voltaire, d'Alembert, Diderot, and Helvetius, on the Immortality of the Soul, on a particular superintending Providence, and on a Future State of Rewards and and Punishments, are sent down to the soldiers along with their civic oaths. Of this I have no doubt; as I understand, that a certain description of reading makes no inconsiderable part of their military exercises, and that they are full as well supplied with the ammunition of pamphlets as of cartridges.

To prevent the mischiefs arising from conspiracies, irregular confultations, feditious committees, and monftrous democratic affemblies [comitia, comices'] of the foldiers, and all the diforders arifing from idleness, luxury, dissipation, and infubordination, I believe the most astonishing means have been used, that ever occurred to men, even in all the inventions of this prolific age. It is no lefs than this :- The King has promulgated in circular letters to all the regiments his direct authority and encouragement, that the feveral corps should join themselves with the clubs and confederations in the feveral municipalities, and mix with them in their feafts and civic entertainments! This jolly discipline, it seems, is to soften the ferocity of their minds; to reconcile them to their bottle companions of other descriptions; and to merge particular conspiracies in more general affociations*. That this remedy would be pleasing to the foldiers, ^{*} Comme sa Majesté y a reconnu, non une système d'associations particulières, mais une réunion de volontés de tous les François pour la liberté et la prosperité communes, ainsi pour le maintien de l'ordre publique; il a pensé qu'il convenoit que chaque regiment prit part a ces sêtes civiques pour multiplier les rapports, et reserver les liens d'union entre les citoyens et les troupes.—Lest I should not be credited, I insert the words, authorising the troops to seast with the popular consederacies.

as they are described by Mr. de la Tour du Pin, I can readily believe; and that, however mutinous otherwise, they will dutifully submit themselves to these royal proclamations. But I should queftion whether all this civic fwearing, clubbing, and feafting, would dispose them more than at present they are disposed, to an obedience to their officers; or teach them better to submit to the austere rules of military discipline. It will make them admirable citizens after the French mode, but not quite fo good foldiers after any mode. A doubt might well arise, whether the conversations at these good tables, would fit them a great deal the better for the character of mere instruments, which this veteran officer and ftatefman justly obferves, the nature of things always requires an army to be.

Concerning the likelihood of this improvement in discipline, by the free conversation of the soldiers with the municipal festive societies, which is thus officially encouraged by royal authority and fanction, we may judge by the state of the municipalities themselves, furnished to us by the war minister in this very speech. He conceives good hopes of the fuccess of his endeavours towards refloring order for the present from the good disposition of certain regiments; but he finds fomething cloudy with regard to the future. As to preventing the return of confusion " for this, the administra-"tion (fays he) cannot be answerable to you, as " long as they fee the municipalities arrogate to sthemfelves an authority over the troops, which " your inflitutions have referved wholly to the mo-" narch.

"narch. You have fixed the limits of the military authority and the municipal authority. You have bounded the action, which you have permitted to the latter over the former, to the right of requifition; but never did the letter or the fipirit of your decrees authorife the commons in these municipalities to break the officers, to try them, to give orders to the soldiers, to drive them from the posts committed to their guard, to ftop them in their marches ordered by the King, or, in a word, to enslave the troops to the caprice of each of the cities or even market towns through which they are to pass."

Such is the character and disposition of the municipal fociety which is to reclaim the foldiery, to bring them back to the true principles of military fubordination, and to render them machines in the hands of the fupreme power of the country! Such are the diffempers of the French troops! Such is their cure! As the army is, fo is the navy. The municipalities fuperfede the orders of the affembly, and the feamen in their turn superfede the orders of the municipalities. From my heart I pity the condition of a respectable servant of the public, like this war minister, obliged in his old age to pledge the affembly in their civic cups, and to enter with an hoary head into all the fantaftick vagaries of these juvenile politicians. Such fchemes are not like propolitions coming from a man of fifty years wear and tear amongst mankind. They feem rather fuch as ought to be expected from those grand compounders in politics, who shorten the road to their degrees in the state :

state; and have a certain inward fanatical affurance and illumination upon all fubjects; upon the credit of which one of their doctors has thought fit, with great applause, and greater success, to caution the affembly not to attend to old men, or to any persons who valued themselves upon their experience. I suppose all the ministers of state must qualify, and take this teft; wholly abjuring the errors and herefies of experience and observation. Every man has his own relish. But I think, if I could not attain to the wisdom, I would at least preserve fomething of the stiff and peremptory dignity of age. These gentlemen deal in regeneration; but at any price I should hardly yield my rigid fibres to be regenerated by them; nor begin, in my grand climacteric, to fquall in their new accents, or to stammer, in my second cradle, the elemental founds of their barbarous metaphylics *. Si ifti mibi largiantur ut repueriscam, et in eorum cunis vagiam, valde recusem!

The imbecility of any part of the puerile and pedantic fystem, which they call a constitution, cannot be laid open without discovering the utter infussiciency and mischief of every other part with which it comes in contact, or that bears any the remotest relation to it. You cannot propose a remedy for the incompetence of the crown, without displaying the debility of the affembly. You cannot deliberate on the consusion of the army of the state, without disclosing the worse disorders of the armed municipalities. The military lays open the civil, and the civil betrays the military anarchy. I wish every body carefully to perufe the eloquent speech (fuch it is) of Monf. de la Tour du Pin. He attributes the falvation of the municipalities to the good behaviour of some of the troops. These troops are to preserve the well-disposed part of those municipalities, which is confessed to be the weakest, from the pillage of the worlt disposed, which is the strongest. But the municipalities affect a fovereignty and will command those troops which are necessary for their protection. Indeed they must command them or court them. The municipalities, by the necesfity of their fituation, and by the republican powers they have obtained, must, with relation to the military, be the mafters, or the fervants, or the confederates, or each fucceffively; or they must make a jumble of all together, according to circumstances What government is there to coerce the army but the municipality, or the municipality but the army? To preferve concord where authority is extinguished, at the hazard of all consequences, the affembly attempts to cure the diffempers by the diffempers themselves; and they hope to preserve themselves from a purely military democracy, by giving it a debauched interest in the municipal.

If the foldiers once come to mix for any time in the municipal clubs, cabals, and confederacies, an elective attraction will draw them to the lowest and most desperate part. With them will be their habits, affections, and sympathies. The military conspiracies, which are to be remedied by civic confederacies; the rebellious municipalities, which are to be rendered obedient by furnishing them with the means of feducing the very armies of the flate that are to keep them in order; all these chimeras of a monstrous and portentous policy, must aggravate the confusions from which they have arisen. There must be blood. The want of common judgment manifested in the construction of all their descriptions of forces, and in all their kinds of civil and judicial authorities, will make it flow. Diforders may be quieted in one time and in one part. They will break out in others; because the evil is radical and intrinsic. All these schemes of mixing mutinous foldiers with feditious citizens, must weaken still more and more the military connection of foldiers with their officers, as well as add military and mutinous audacity to turbulent artificers and peafants. To fecure a real army, the officer should be first and last in the eye of the foldier; first and last in his attention, observance, and efteem. Officers it feems there are to be, whose chief qualification must be temper and patience. They are to manage their troops by electioneering arts. They must bear themselves as candidates not as commanders. But as by fuch means power may be occasionally in their hands, the authority by which they are to be nominated becomes of high importance.

What you may do finally, does not appear; nor is it of much moment, whilft the strange and contradictory relation between your army and all the parts of your republic, as well as the puzzled relation of those parts to each other and to the whole, remain as they are. You seem to have given the provisional nomination of the officers, in the first instance, to the king, with a reserve of approbation by the National Assembly. Men who have an interest to pursue are extremely fagacious in discovering the true seat of power. They must foon perceive that those who can negative indefinitely, in reality appoint. The officers must therefore look to their intrigues in that affembly, as the fole certain road to promotion. Still, however, by your new constitution they must begin their solicitation at court. This double negotiation for military rank feems to me a contrivance as well adapted, as if it were studied for no other end, to promote faction in the affembly itself, relative to this vast military patronage; and then to poison the corps of officers with factions of a nature still more dangerous to the fafety of government, upon any bottom on which it can be placed, and destructive in the end to the efficiency of the army itself. Those officers, who lose the promotions intended for them by the crown. must become of a faction opposite to that of the affembly which has rejected their claims, and must nourish discontents in the heart of the army against the ruling powers. Those officers, on the other hand, who, by carrying their point through an interest in the assembly, feel themselves to be at best only second in the good-will of the crown, though first in that of the assembly, must flight an authority which would not advance, and could not retard their promotion. If to avoid these evils you will have no other rule for command or promotion than feniority, you will have an army of formality; at the same time it will become more independent, independent, and more of a military republic. Not they but the king is the machine. A king is not to be deposed by halves. If he is not every thing in the command of an army, he is nothing. What is the effect of a power placed nominally at the head of the army, who to that army is no object of gratitude, or of fear? Such a cypher is not fit for the administration of an object, of all things the most delicate, the supreme command of military men. They must be constrained (and their inclinations lead them to what their necessities require) by a real, vigorous, effective, decided. personal authority. The authority of the affembly itself suffers by passing through such a debilitating channel as they have chosen. The army will not long look to an affembly acting through the organ of false shew, and palpable imposition. They will not feriously yield obedience to a prifoner. They will either despise a pageant, or they will pity a captive king. This relation of your army to the crown will, if I am not greatly miftaken, become a ferious dilemma in your poli-

It is befides to be confidered, whether an affembly like yours, even supposing that it was in possesfion of another fort of organ through which its orders were to pass, is fit for promoting the obedience and discipline of an army. It is known, that armies have hitherto yielded a very precarious and uncertain obedience to any senate, or popular authority; and they will least of all yield it to an assembly which is to have only a continuance of two years. The officers must totally lose the characteristic disposition polition of military men, if they fee with perfect submission and due admiration, the dominion of pleaders; especially when they find, that they have a new court to pay to an endless succession of those pleaders, whose military policy, and the genius of whose command (if they should have any) must be as uncertain as their duration is transfient. In the weakness of one kind of authority, and in the fluctuation of all, the officers of an army will remain for fome time mutinous and full of faction, until some popular general, who understands the art of conciliating the foldiery, and who possesses the true spirit of command, shall draw the eyes of all men upon himfelf. Armies will obey him on his personal account. There is no other way of fecuring military obedience in this state of things. But the moment in which that event shall happen, the person who really commands the army is your mafter; the mafter (that is little) of your king, the mafter of your affembly, the mafter of your whole republic.

How came the affembly by their present power over the army? Chiefly, to be sure, by debauching the soldiers from their officers. They have begun by a most terrible operation. They have touched the central point, about which the particles that compose armies are at repose. They have destroyed the principle of obedience in the great effential critical link between the officer and the soldier, just where the chain of military subordination commences, and on which the whole of that system depends. The soldier is told, he is a citizen, and has the rights of man and citizen.

The right of a man, he is told, is to be his own governor, and to be ruled only by those to whom he delegates that felf-government. It is very natural he should think, that he ought most of all to have his choice where he is to yield the greatest degree of obedience. He will therefore, in all probability, fystematically do, what he does at present occasionally; that is, he will exercise at least a negafive in the choice of his officers. At present the officers are known at best to be only permissive, and on their good behaviour. In fact, there have been many inftances in which they have been cashiered by their corps. Here is a fecond negative on the choice of the king; a negative as effectual at least as the other of the affembly. The foldiers know already that it has been a question, not ill received in the national affembly, whether they ought not to have the direct choice of their officers, or fome proportion of them? When fuch matters are in deliberation, it is no extravagant supposition that they will incline to the opinion most favourable to their pretenfions. They will not bear to be deemed the army of an imprisoned king, whilst another army in the fame country, with whom too they are to feast and confederate, is to be confidered as the free army of a free constitution. They will cast their eyes on the other and more permanent army; I mean the municipal. That corps, they well know, does actually elect its own officers. They may not be able to difcern the grounds of distinction on which they are not to elect a Marquis de la Fayette (or what is his new name) of their own? If this election of a commander in chief be a part of the rights of men, why not of theirs? They fee elective justices of peace, elective judges, elective curates, elective bishops, elective municipalities, and elective commanders of the Parifian army .- Why fhould they alone be excluded? Are the brave troops of France the only men in that nation who are not the fit judges of military merit, and of the qualifications necessary for a commander in chief? Are they paid by the state, and do they therefore lose the rights of men? They are a part of that nation themselves, and contribute to that pay. And is not the king, is not the national affembly, and are not all who elect the national affembly, likewife paid? Inflead of feeing all these forfeit their rights by their receiving a falary, they perceive that in all thefe cases a falary is given for the exercise of those rights. All your refolutions, all your proceedings, all your debates, all the works of your doctors in religion and politics, have industriously been put into their hands: and you expect that they will apply to their own case just as much of your doctrines and examples as fuits your pleafure.

Every thing depends upon the army in fuch a government as yours; for you have industriously destroyed all the opinions, and prejudices, and, as far as in you lay, all the instincts which support government. Therefore the moment any difference arises between your national assembly and any part of the nation, you must have recourse to force. Nothing else is lest to you; or rather you have lest nothing else to yourselves. You see by the report of your war minister, that the distribution of the army is in a great measure made with a view of internal coercion *. You must rule by an army; and you have infused into that army by which you rule, as well as into the whole body of the nation, principles which after a time must difable you in the use you resolve to make of it. The king is to call out troops to act against his people, when the world has been told, and the affertion is still ringing in our ears, that troops ought not to fire on citizens. The colonies affert to themselves an independent constitution and a free trade. They must be constrained by troops. In what chapter of your code of the rights of men are they able to read, that it is a part of the rights of men to have their commerce monopolized and restrained for the benefit of others. As the colonists rife on you, the negroes rife on them. Troops again-Maffacre, torture, hanging! These are your rights of men! These are the fruits of metaphyfic declarations wantonly made, and shamefully retracted! It was but the other day that the farmers of land in one of your provinces refused to pay some forts of rents to the lord of the foil. In confequence of this you decree, that the country people shall pay all rents and dues, except those which as grievances you have abolished; and if they refuse, then you order the king to march troops against them. You lay down metaphyfic propositions which infer universal consequences, and then you attempt to limit logic by despotism. The leaders of the present system tell them of their rights, as men, to take fortresses, to murder guards, to seize on kings without the least appearance of authority even from the assembly, whilst, as the sovereign legislative body, that assembly was sitting in the name of the nation—and yet these leaders presume to order out the troops, which have acted in these very disorders, to coerce those who shall judge on the principles, and follow the examples, which have been guarantied by their own approbation.

The leaders teach the people to abhor and reject all feodality as the barbarism of tyranny, and they tell them afterwards how much of that barbarous tyranny they are to bear with patience. As they are prodigal of light with regard to grievances, fo the people find them sparing in the extreme with regard to redrefs. They know that not only certain quit-rents and personal duties, which you have permitted them to redeem (but have furnished no money for the redemption) are as nothing to those burthens for which you have made no provision at all. They know, that almost the whole system of landed property in its origin is feudal; that it is the distribution of the possessions of the original proprietors, made by a barbarous conqueror to his barbarous inftruments; and that the most grievous effects of the conquest are the land rents of every kind, as without question they are.

The peafants, in all probability, are the defeendants of these antient proprietors, Romans or Gauls. But if they fail, in any degree, in the titles which they make on the principles of antiquaries and lawyers, they retreat into the citadel of the rights of men. There they find that men are equal; and the earth, the kind and equal mother of all, ought not to be monopolized to fofter the pride and luxury of any men, who by nature are no better than themselves, and who, if they do not labour for their bread, are worfe. They find. that by the laws of nature the occupant and fubduer of the foil is the true proprietor; that there is no prescription against nature; and that the agreements (where any there are) which have been made with their landlords, during the time of flavery, are only the effect of dureffe and force; and that when the people re-entered into the rights of men, those agreements were made as void as every thing else which had been settled under the prevalence of the old feudal and ariftocratic tyranny. They will tell you that they fee no difference between an idler with a hat and a national cockade, and an idler in a cowl or in a rochet. If you ground the title to rents on fuccession and prescription, they tell you, from the speech of Mr. Camus, published by the national affembly for their information, that things ill begun cannot avail themfelves of prescription; that the title of these lords was vicious in its origin; and that force is at least as bad as fraud. As to the title by fucceffion, they will tell you, that the fucceffion of those who have cultivated the foil is the true pedigree of property, and not rotten parchments and filly fubilitutions; that the lords have enjoyed their usurpation too long; and that if they allow to these lay monks any charitable pension.

pension, they ought to be thankful to the bounty of the true proprietor, who is so generous towards a false claimant to his goods.

When the peafants give you back that coin of fophistic reason, on which you have set your image and fuperscription, you cry it down as base money, and tell them you will pay for the future with French guards, and dragoons, and huffars. You hold up, to chaftife them, the fecond-hand authority of a king, who is only the instrument of destroying, without any power of protecting either the people or his own perfon. Through him it feems you will make yourselves obeyed. They answer, You have taught us that there are no gentlemen; and which of your principles teach us to bow to kings whom we have not elected? We know, without your teaching, that lands were given for the support of feudal dignities, feudal titles, and feudal offices. When you took down the cause as a grievance, why should the more grievous effect remain? As there are now no hereditary honours, and no diftinguished families, why are we taxed to maintain what you tell us ought not to exist? You have sent down our old aristocratic landlords in no other character, and with no other title, but that of exactors under your authority. Have you endeavoured to make these your rentgatherers respectable to us? No. You have sent them to us with their arms reversed, their shields broken, their impresses defaced; and so displumed, degraded, and metamorphofed, fuch unfeathered twolegged things, that we no longer know them. They are strangers to us. They do not even go by the names of our ancient lords. Physically they

they may be the fame men; though we are not quite fure of that, on your new philosophic doctrines of personal identity. In all other respects they are totally changed. We do not fee why we have not as good a right to refuse them their rents, as you have to abrogate all their honours, titles, and diffinctions. This we have never commissioned you to do; and it is one instance, among many indeed, of your assumption of undelegated power. We fee the burghers of Paris, through their clubs, their mobs, and their national guards, directing you at their pleafure, and giving that as law to you, which, under your authority, is tranfmitted as law to us. Through you, these burghers dispose of the lives and fortunes of us all. Why fhould not you attend as much to the defires of the laborious husbandman with regard to our rent, by which we are affected in the most serious manner, as you do to the demands of these insolent burghers, relative to diffinctions and titles of honour, by which neither they nor we are affected at all? But we find you pay more regard to their fancies than to our necessities. Is it among the rights of man to pay tribute to his equals? Before this measure of yours, we might have thought we were not perfectly equal. We might have entertained fome old, habitual, unmeaning prepoffession in favour of those landlords; but we cannot conceive with what other view than that of destroying all respect to them, you could have made the law that degrades them. You have forbidden us to treat them with any of the old formalities of respect, and now you fend troops to fabre and to bayonet us into a fubmission to fear and force, which you did not fusfer us to yield to the mild authority of opinion.

The ground of fome of these arguments is horrid and ridiculous to all rational ears; but to the politicians of metaphylics who have opened schools for fophistry, and made establishments for anarchy, it is folid and conclusive. It is obvious, that on a mere confideration of the right, the leaders in the affembly would not in the least have scrupled to abrogate the rents along with the titles and family enfigns. It would be only to follow up the principle of their reasonings, and to complete the analogy of their conduct. But they had newly poffeffed themselves of a great body of landed property by confiscation. They had this commodity at market; and the market would have been wholly destroyed, if they were to permit the husbandmen to riot in the speculations with which they fo freely intoxicated themfelves. The only fecurity which property enjoys in any one of its descriptions, is from the interests of their rapacity with regard to some other. They have left nothing but their own arbitrary pleafure to determine what property is to be protected and what fubverted.

Neither have they left any principle by which any of their municipalities can be bound to obedience; or even conscientiously obliged not to separate from the whole, to become independent, or to connect itself with some other state. The people of Lyons, it seems, have refused lately to pay taxes. Why should they not? What lawful authority is there left to exact them? The king imposed some of them. The old states, methodifed by orders, fettled the more ancient. They may fay to the affembly, Who are you, that are not our kings, nor the states we have elected, nor fit on the principles on which we have elected you? And who are we, that when we fee the gabelles which you have ordered to be paid, wholly shaken off, when we fee the act of disobedience afterwards ratified by yourfelves, who are we, that we are not to judge what taxes we ought or ought not to pay, and who are not to avail ourselves of the fame powers, the validity of which you have approved in others? To this the answer is, We will fend troops. The last reason of kings, is always the first with your assembly. This military aid may ferve for a time, whilft the impression of the increase of pay remains, and the vanity of being umpires in all disputes is flattered. But this weapon will fnap short, unfaithful to the hand that employs it. The affembly keep a school where, systematically, and with unremitting perseverance, they teach principles, and form regulations destructive to all spirit of subordination, civil and militaryand then they expect that they shall hold in obedience an anarchic people by an anarchic army.

The municipal army, which, according to their new policy, is to balance this national army, if confidered in itself only, is of a constitution much more simple, and in every respect less exceptionable. It is a mere democratic body, unconnected with the crown or the kingdom; armed, and trained, and officered at the pleasure of the districts to which the corps feverally belong; and the personal service of the individuals, who compose, or the sine in lieu of personal service, are directed by the same authority *. Nothing is more uniform. If, however, considered in any relation to the crown, to the national assembly, to the public tribunals, or to the other army, or considered in a view to any coherence or connection between its parts, it seems a monster, and can hardly fail to terminate its perplexed movements in some great national calamity. It is a worse preservative of a general constitution, than the systasis of Crete, or the consederation of Poland, or any other ill-devised corrective which has yet been imagined, in the necessities produced by an ill-constructed system of government.

Having concluded my few remarks on the conflitution of the fupreme power, the executive, the judicature, the military, and on the reciprocal relation of all these establishments, I shall say something of the ability shewed by your legislators with regard to the revenue.

In their proceedings relative to this object, if poffible, still fewer traces appear of political judgment or financial resource. When the states met, it seemed to be the great object to improve the system of revenue, to enlarge its collection, to cleanse it of

^{*} I see by Mr. Necker's account, that the national guards of Paris have received, over and above the money levied within their own city, about 145,000 l. sterling out of the public treasure. Whether this be an actual payment for the nine months of their existence, or an estimate of their yearly charge, I do not clearly perceive. It is of no great importance, as certainly they may take whatever they please.

oppression and vexation, and to establish it on the most folid footing. Great were the expectations entertained on that head throughout Europe. It was by this grand arrangement that France was to stand or fall; and this became, in my opinion, very properly, the test by which the skill and patriotism of those who ruled in that affembly would be tried. The revenue of the state is the state. In effect all depends upon it, whether for fupport or for reformation. The dignity of every occupation wholly depends upon the quantity and the kind of virtue that may be exerted in it. As all great qualities of the mind which operate in public, and are not merely fuffering and passive, require force for their display, I had almost faid for their unequivocal existence, the revenue, which is the spring of all power, becomes in its administration the sphere of every active virtue. Public virtue, being of a nature magnificent and fplendid, inflituted for great things, and converfant about great concerns, requires abundant scope and room, and cannot spread and grow under confinement, and in circumftances straitened, narrow, and fordid. Through the revenue alone the body politic can act in its true genius and character, and therefore it will display just as much of its collective virtue, and as much of that virtue which may characterife those who move it, and are, as it were, its life and guiding principle, as it is possessed of a just revenue. For from hence, not only magnanimity, and liberality, and beneficence, and fortitude, and providence, and the tutelary protection of all good arts, derive their food, and the growth of their organs, but continence, and felf-denial, and labour, and vigilance, and frugality, and whatever elfe there is in which the mind shews itself above the appetite, are no where more in their proper element than in the provision and distribution of the public wealth. It is therefore not without reason that the science of speculative and practical finance, which must take to its aid fo many auxiliary branches of knowledge, stands high in the estimation not only of the ordinary fort, but of the wifest and best men; and as this science has grown with the progress of its object, the prosperity and improvement of nations has generally encreased with the encrease of their revenues; and they will both continue to grow and flourish, as long as the balance between what is left to strengthen the efforts of individuals, and what is collected for the common efforts of the flate, bear to each other a due reciprocal proportion, and are kept in a close correspondence and communication. And perhaps it may be owing to the greatness of revenues, and to the urgency of flate necessities, that old abuses in the constitution of finances are discovered, and their true nature and rational theory comes to be more perfectly understood; infomuch, that a fmaller revenue might have been more diffressing in one period than a far greater is found to be in another; the proportionate wealth even remaining the fame. In this state of things, the French affembly found fomething in their revenues to preserve, to secure, and wisely to administer, as well as to abrogate and alter. Though their proud affumption might justify the feverest tests, yet in trying their abilities on their financial proceedings, I would only confider what is the plain obvious duty of a common finance minister, and try them upon that, and not upon models of ideal perfection.

The objects of a financier are, then, to secure an ample revenue; to impose it with judgment and equality; to employ it occonomically; and when necessity obliges him to make use of credit, to secure its foundations in that inftance, and for ever, by the clearness and candour of his proceedings, the exactness of his calculations, and the solidity of his funds. On these heads we may take a short and diffinct view of the merits and abilities of those in the national affembly, who have taken to themfelves the management of this arduous concern. Far from any encrease of revenue in their hands, I find, by a report of M. Vernier, from the committee of finances, of the fecond of August last, that the amount of the national revenue, as compared with its produce before the revolution, was diminished by the fum of two hundred millions, or eight millions sterling of the annual income, confiderably more than one-third of the whole!

If this be the refult of great ability, never furely was ability displayed in a more distinguished manner, or with so powerful an effect. No common folly, no vulgar incapacity, no ordinary official negligence, even no official crime, no corruption, no peculation, hardly any direct hostility which we have seen in the modern world, could in so short a time have made so complete an overthrow of the finances.

finances, and with them, of the strength of a great kingdom. — Cedo qui vestram rempublicam tantam amisistis tam cito?

The fophisters and declaimers, as foon as the affembly met, began with decrying the ancient conflitution of the revenue in many of its most effential branches, fuch as the public monopoly of falt. They charged it, as truly as unwifely, with being ill-contrived, oppressive, and partial. This reprefentation they were not fatisfied to make use of in speeches preliminary to some plan of reform; they declared it in a folemn resolution or public sentence, as it were judicially, paffed upon it; and this they dispersed throughout the nation. At the time they passed the decree, with the fame gravity they ordered this fame abfurd, oppreffive, and partial tax to be paid, until they could find a revenue to replace it. The confequence was inevitable. The provinces which had been always exempted from this falt monopoly, fome of whom were charged with other contributions, perhaps equivalent, were totally difinclined to bear any part of the burthen, which by an equal distribution was to redeem the others. As to the affembly, occupied as it was with the declaration and violation of the rights of men, and with their arrangements for general confusion, it had neither leifure nor capacity to contrive, nor authority to enforce any plan of any kind relative to the replacing the tax or equalizing it, or compensating the provinces, or for conducting their minds to any scheme of accommodation with the other diffricts which were to be relieved.

The.

The people of the falt provinces, impatient under taxes damned by the authority which had directed their payment, very foon found their patience exhausted. They thought themfelves as skilful in demolishing as the assembly could be. They relieved themselves by throwing off the whole burthen. Animated by this example, each district, or part of a district, judging of its own grievance by its own feeling, and of its remedy by its own opinion, did as it pleased with other taxes.

We are next to fee how they have conducted themselves in contriving equal impositions, proportioned to the means of the citizens, and the least likely to lean heavy on the active capital employed in the generation of that private wealth, from whence the public fortune must be derived. By fuffering the feveral diffricts, and feveral of the individuals in each district, to judge of what part of the old revenue they might withhold, instead of better principles of equality, a new inequality was introduced of the most oppressive kind. Payments were regulated by dispositions. The parts of the kingdom which were the most submissive, the most orderly, or the most affectionate to the commonwealth, bore the whole burthen of the state. Nothing turns out to be fo oppressive and unjust as a feeble government. To fill up all the deficiencies in the old impositions, and the new deficiencies of every kind which were to be expected, what remained to a state without authority? The national affembly called for a voluntary benevolence; for a fourth part of the income of all the citizens, to be estimated on the honour of those who were to pay. They obtained something more than could be rationally calculated, but what was, far indeed, from answerable to their real necessities, and much less to their fond expectations. Rational people could have hoped for little from this their tax in the disguise of a benevolence; a tax, weak, ineffective, and unequal; a tax by which luxury, avarice, and selfishness were screened, and the load thrown upon productive capital, upon integrity, generosity, and public spirit—a tax of regulation upon virtue. At length the mask is thrown off, and they are now trying means (with little success) of exacting their benevolence by force.

This benevolence, the ricketty offspring of weakness, was to be supported by another resource, the twin brother of the fame prolific imbecility. The patriotic donations were to make good the failure of the patriotic contribution. John Doe was to become fecurity for Richard Roe. By this scheme they took things of much price from the giver, comparatively of small value to the receiver; they ruined feveral trades; they pillaged the crown of its ornaments, the churches of their plate, and the people of their personal decorations. The invention of these juvenile pretenders to liberty,was in reality nothing more than a fervile imitation of one of the poorest resources of doting despotism. They took an old huge fullbottomed perriwig out of the wardrobe of the antiquated frippery of Louis XIV. to cover the premature baldness of the national affembly. Z 2 They

They produced this old-fashioned formal folly, though it had been fo abundantly exposed in the Memoirs of the Duke de St. Simon, if to reafonable men it had wanted any arguments to difplay its mischief and insufficiency. A device of the fame kind was tried in my memory by Louis XV. but it answered at no time. However, the necessities of ruinous wars were some excuse for desperate projects. The deliberations of calamity are rarely wife. But here was a feafon for disposition and providence. It was in a time of profound peace, then enjoyed for five years, and promifing a much longer continuance, that they had recourse to this desperate trifling. They were fure to lofe more reputation by fporting, in their ferious fituation, with thefe toys and playthings of finance, which have filled half their journals, than could possibly be compensated by the poor temporary fupply which they afforded. It feemed as if those who adopted such projects were wholly ignorant of their circumstances, or wholly unequal to their necessities. Whatever virtue may be in these devices, it is obvious that neither the patriotic gifts. nor the patriotic contribution, can ever be reforted to again. The resources of public folly are soon exhaufted. The whole indeed of their scheme of revenue is to make, by any artifice, an appearance of a full refervoir for the hour, whilft at the fame time they cut off the fprings and living fountains of perennial fupply. The account not long fince furnished by Mr. Necker was meant, without question, to be favourable. He gives a flattering view of the means of getting through the year; but he expresses, as it is natural he should, some apprehension for that which was to succeed. On this last prognostic, instead of entering into the grounds of this apprehension, in order by a proper forefight, to prevent the prognoiticated evil, Mr. Necker receives a fort of friendly reprimand from the prefident of the affembly.

As to their other schemes of taxation, it is impossible to fay any thing of them with certainty; because they have not yet had their operation; but nobody is fo fanguine as to imagine they will fill up any perceptible part of the wide gaping breach which their incapacity has made in their revenues. Atpresent the state of their treasury sinks every day more and more in cash, and swells more and more in fictitious reprefentation. When fo little within or without is now found but paper, the representative not of opulence but of want, the creature not of credit but of power, they imagine that our flourishing flate in England is owing to that bank-paper, and not the bank-paper to the flourishing condition of our commerce, to the folidity of our credit, and to the total exclusion of all idea of power from any part of the transaction. They forget that, in England, not one shilling of paper-money of any description is received but of choice; that the whole has had its origin in cash actually deposited; and that it is convertible, at pleafure, in an instant, and without the smallest loss, into cash again. Our paper is of value in commerce, because in law it is of none. It is powerful on Change, because in Westminster-hall it is impotent. In payment of a debt Z 3 of twenty shillings, a creditor may refuse all the paper of the bank of England. Nor is there amongst us a single public security, of any quality or nature whatsoever, that is enforced by authority. In fact it might be easily shewn, that our paper wealth, instead of lessening the real coin, has a tendency to increase it; instead of being a substitute for money, it only facilitates its entry, its exit, and its circulation; that it is the symbol of prosperity, and not the badge of distress. Never was a scarcity of cash, and an exuberance of paper, a subject of complaint in this nation.

Well! but a leffening of prodigal expences, and the ceconomy which has been introduced by the virtuous and fapient affembly, makes amends for the losses sustained in the receipt of revenue. In this at least they have fulfilled the duty of a financier. Have those, who say so, looked at the expences of the national affembly itself, of the municipalities, of the city of Paris, of the increased pay of the two armies, of the new police, of the new judicatures? Have they even carefully compared the present pension-lift with the former? These politicians have been cruel, not œconomical. Comparing the expences of the former prodigal government and its relation to the then revenues with the expences of this new fystem as opposed to the state of its new treasury, I believe the prefent will be found beyond all comparison more chargeable *.

^{*} The reader will observe, that I have but lightly touched (my plan demanded nothing more) on the condition of the French

It remains only to confider the proofs of financial ability, furnished by the present French managers when they are to raise supplies on credit. Here I am a little at a stand; for credit, properly speaking, they have none. The credit of the antient government was not indeed the best: but they could always, on fome terms, command money, not only at home, but from most of the countries of Europe where a furplus capital was accumulated; and the credit of that government improving daily. The establishment of a system of liberty would of course be supposed to give it new ftrength; and so it would actually have done, if a fystem of liberty had been established. What offers has their government of pretended liberty had from Holland, from Hamburgh, from Switzerland, from Genoa, from England, for a dealing in their paper? Why should these nations of commerce and œconomy enter into any pecuniary dealings with a people

French finances, as connected with the demands upon them. If I had intended to do otherwise, the materials in my hands for fuch a talk are not altogether perfect. On this subject I refer the reader to M. de Calonne's work; and the tremendous difplay that he has made of the havock and devastation in the public estate, and in all the affairs of France, caused by the prefumptuous good intentions of ignorance and incapacity; fuch effects as those causes will always produce when charged with a plenitude of power. Looking over that account with a pretty firict eye, and, with perhaps too much rigour, deducting every thing which may be placed to the account of a financier out of place, who might be supposed by his enemies desirous of making the most of his cause, I believe it will be found, that a more falutary leffon of caution against the daring spirit of innovators than this, which has been supplied at the expence of France, never was at any time furnished to mankind.

who attempt to reverse the very nature of things; amongst whom they see the debtor prescribing, at the point of the bayonet, the medium of his solvency to the creditor; discharging one of his engagements with another; turning his very penury into his resource; and paying his interest with his rags?

Their fanatical confidence in the omnipotence of church plunder, has induced these philosophers to overlook all care of the public estate, just as the dream of the philosopher's stone induces dupes, under the more plaufible delufion of the hermetic art, to neglect all rational means of improving their fortunes. With these philosophic financiers, this universal medicine made of church mummy is to cure all the evils of the state. These gentlemen perhaps do not believe a great deal in the miracles of piety; but it cannot be queftioned, that they have an undoubting faith in the prodigies of facrilege. Is there a debt which preffes them-Isfue assignats. - Are compensations to be made, or a maintenance decreed to those whom they have robbed of their freehold in their office, or expelled from their profession-Assignats. Is a fleet to be fitted out-Assignats. If sixteen millions sterling of these assignats, forced on the people, leave the wants of the state as urgent as everiffue, fays one, thirty millions sterling of affignatsfays another, iffue fourfcore millions more of affiguats. The only difference among their financial factions is on the greater or the leffer quantity of affignats to be imposed on the publick sufferance. They are all professors of assignats. Even those, whose natural good fense and knowledge of commerce. merce, not obliterated by philosophy, furnish decifive arguments against this delusion, conclude their arguments, by proposing the emission of assignats. I suppose they must talk of assignats, as no other language would be understood. All experience of their inefficacy does not in the least discourage them. Are the old assignats depreciated at market? What is the remedy? Iffue new assignats.-Mais si maladia, opiniatria, non vult se garire, quid illi facere? assignare-postea assignare; ensuita assignare. The word is a trifle altered. The Latin of your present doctors may be better than that of your old comedy; their wisdom, and the variety of their refources, are the fame. They have not more notes in their fong than the cuckow; though, far from the foftness of that harbinger of fummer and plenty, their voice is as harsh and as ominous as that of the raven.

Who but the most desperate adventurers in philosophy and finance could at all have thought of destroying the settled revenue of the state, the sole security for the public credit, in the hope of rebuilding it with the materials of confiscated property? If, however, an excessive zeal for the state should have led a pious and venerable prelate (by anticipation a state of the church*) to pillage his own order, and, for the good of the church and people, to take upon himself the place of grand sinancier of confiscation, and comptroller general of sacrilege, he and his coadjutors were, in my opinion, bound to shew, by their subsequent conduct, that they knew something of the office they affumed. When they had resolved to appropriate to the Fisc, a certain portion of the landed property of their conquered country, it was their business to render their bank a real fund of credit; as far as such a bank was capable of becoming so.

To establish a current circulating credit upon any Land-bank, under any circumftances whatfoever. has hitherto proved difficult at the very leaft. The attempt has commonly ended in bankruptcy. But when the affembly were led, through a contempt of moral, to a defiance of œconomical principles, it might at least have been expected, that nothing would be omitted on their part to lessen this difficulty, to prevent any aggravation of this bankruptcy. It might be expected that to render your Land-bank tolerable, every means would be adopted that could display openness and candour in the statement of the fecurity; every thing which could aid the recovery of the demand. To take things in their most favourable point of view, your condition was that of a man of a large landed effate, which he wished to dispose of for the discharge of a debt, and the fupply of certain fervices. Not being able instantly to fell, you wished to mortgage, What would a man of fair intentions, and a commonly clear understanding, do in fuch circumstances? Ought he not first to ascertain the gross value of the estate; the charges of its management and disposition; the encumbrances perpetual and temporary of all kinds that affect it; then, firiking a net furplus, to calculate the just value of the fecurity? When that furplus (the only fecurity to the creditor) had been clearly ascertained, and properly vested in the hands of trustees; then he would indicate the parcels to be fold, and the time, and conditions of sale; after this, he would admit the public creditor, if he chose it, to subscribe his stock into this new fund; or he might receive proposals for an assignat from those who would advance money to purchase this species of security.

This would be to proceed like men of bufiness, methodically and rationally; and on the only principles of public and private credit that have an existence. The dealer would then know exactly what he purchased; and the only doubt which could hang upon his mind would be, the dread of the resumption of the spoil, which one day might be made (perhaps with an addition of punishment) from the sacrilegious gripe of those execrable wretches who could become purchasers at the auction of their innocent fellow-citizens.

An open and exact statement of the clear value of the property, and of the time, the circumstances, and the place of sale, were all necessary, to essace as much as possible the stigma that has hitherto been branded on every kind of Land-bank. It became necessary on another principle, that is, on account of a pledge of saith previously given on that subject, that their suture sidelity in a slippery concern might be established by their adherence to their first engagement. When they had finally determined on a state resource from church booty, they came, on the 14th of April 1790, to a solemn resolution on the subject; and pledged themselves to their country, "that in the statement of the public "charges

"charges for each year there should be brought to account a sum sufficient for destraying the expences of the R. C. A. religion, the support of the ministers at the altars, the relief of the poor, the pensions to the ecclesiastics, secular as well as regular, of the one and of the other sex, in order that the estates and goods which are at the disposal of the nation may be disengaged of all sharges, and employed by the representatives, or the legislative body, to the great and most pressing exigencies of the state." They further engaged, on the same day, that the sum necessary for the year 1791 should be forthwith determined.

In this resolution they admit it their duty to show distinctly the expence of the above objects, which, by other resolutions, they had before engaged should be first in the order of provision. They admit that they ought to shew the estate clear and difengaged of all charges, and that they should shew it immediately. Have they done this immediately, or at any time? Have they ever furnished a rent-roll of the immoveable estates, or given in an inventory of the moveable effects which they confiscate to their assignats? In what manner they can fulfil their engagements of holding out to public fervice "an eftate difengaged of all charges," without authenticating the value of the effate, or the quantum of the charges, I leave it to their English admirers to explain. Inflantly upon this affurance, and previously to any one step towards making it good, they iffue, on the credit of fo handsome a declaration, fixteen millions sterling of their paper. This was manly. Who, after this masterly stroke, can doubt of their abilities in finance?—But then, before any other emission of these financial indulgences, they took care at least to make good their original promise!—If such estimate, either of the value of the estate or the amount of the incumbrances, has been made, it has escaped me. I never heard of it.

At length they have fpoken out, and they have made a full discovery of their abominable fraud, in holding out the church lands as a fecurity for any debts or any fervice whatfoever. They rob only to enable them to cheat; but in a very short time they defeat the ends both of the robbery and the fraud, by making out accounts for other purpofes, which blow up their whole apparatus of force and of deception. I am obliged to M. de Calonne for his reference to the document which proves this extraordinary fact: it had, by fome means, escaped me. Indeed it was not necessary to make out my affertion as to the breach of faith on the declaration of the 4th of April 1790. By a report of their Committee it now appears, that the charge of keeping up the reduced ecclefiaftical eftablishments, and other expences attendant on religion, and maintaining the religious of both fexes, retained or pensioned, and the other concomitant expences of the fame nature, which they have brought upon themselves by this convulsion in property, exceeds the income of the estates acquired by it in the enormous sum of two millions sterling annually; besides a debt of seven millions and upwards. These are the calculating powers of imposture! This is the finance of philofophy! This is the refult of all the delufions held out to engage a miferable people in rebellion, murder, and facrilege, and to make them prompt and zealous inftruments in the ruin of their country! Never did a state, in any case, enrich itself by the confiscations of the civizens. This new experiment has succeeded like all the rest. Every honest mind, every true lover of liberty and humanity must rejoice to find that injustice is not always good policy nor rapine the high road to riches. I subjoin with pleasure, in a note, the able and spirited observations of M. de Calonne on this subject.*.

* " Ce n'est point à l'assemblée entière que je m'adresse ici; je ne parle qu'à ceux qui l'égarent, en lui cachant fous des gazes séduisantes le but où ils l'entraînent. C'est à eux que je dis : votre objet, vous n'en disconviendrez pas, c'est d'ôter tout espoir au clergé, & de consommer sa ruine; c'est-la, en ne vous soupçonnant d'aucune combinaison de cupidité, d'aucun regard fur le jeu des effets publics, c'est-là ce qu'on doit croire que vous avez en vue dans la terrible opération que vous proposez; c'est ce qui doit en être le fruit. Mais le peuple que vous y intéreffez, quel avantage peut-il y trouver? En vous servant sans cesse de lui, que faites vous pour lui? Rien. absolument rien; &, au contraire, vous faites ce qui ne conduit qu'à l'accabler de nouvelles charges. Vous avez rejeté, à fon prejudice, une offre de 400 millions, dont l'acceptation pouvoit devenir un moyen de soulagement en sa faveur; & à cette ressource, aussi profitable que legitime, vous avez substitué une injustice ruineuse, qui, de votre propre aveu, charge le trésor public, & par conséquent le peuple, d'un surcroît de depense annuelle de 50 millions au moins, & d'un remboursement de 150 millions.

"Malheureux peuple, voilà ce que vous vaut en dernier réfultat l'expropriation de l'Eglise, & la dureté des décrets taxateurs du traitement des ministres d'une religion bienfaisante; & desormais ils seront à votre charge: leurs charités soulageoient les pauvres; & vous allez être imposés pour subvenir à leur entretien!"—De l'Etat de la France, p. 81, See also

p. oz, and the following pages.

In order to persuade the world of the bottomless resource of ecclesiastical confiscation, the asfembly have proceeded to other confifcations of estates in offices, which could not be done with any common colour without being compenfated out of this grand confiscation of landed property. They have thrown upon this fund, which was to shew a surplus, disengaged of all charges, a new charge; namely, the compensation to the whole body of the difbanded judicature; and of all suppressed offices and estates; a charge which I cannot afcertain, but which unquestionably amounts to many French millions. Another of the new charges, is an annuity of four hundred and eighty thousand pounds sterling, to be paid (if they choose to keep faith) by daily payments, for the interest of the first assignats. Have they ever given themselves the trouble to state fairly the expence of the management of the church lands in the hands of the municipalities, to whose care, skill, and diligence, and that of their legion of unknown under agents, they have chosen to commit the charge of the forfeited estates, and the confequence of which had been fo ably pointed out by the bishop of Nancy?

But it is unneceffary to dwell on these obvious heads of incumbrance. Have they made out any clear state of the grand incumbrance of all, I mean the whole of the general and municipal establishments of all forts, and compared it with the regular income by revenue? Every desiciency in these becomes a charge on the confiscated estate, before the creditor can plant his cabbages on an acre of church property. There is no other prop than this confifcation to keep the whole state from tumbling to the ground. In this fituation they have purpolely covered all that they ought industriously to have cleared, with a thick fog; and then, blindfold themelves, like bulls that shut their eyes when they push, they drive, by the point of the bayonets, their flaves, blindfolded indeed no worse than their lords, to take their fictions for currencies, and to fwallow down paper pills by thirtyfour millions sterling at a dose. Then they proudly lay in their claim to a future credit, on failure of all their past engagements, and at a time when (if in fuch a matter any thing can be clear) it is clear that the furplus citates will never answer even the first of their mortgages, I mean that of the four hundred million (or fixteen millions sterling) of assignats. In all this procedure I can discern neither the solid fense of plain-dealing, nor the subtle dexterity of ingenious fraud. The objection within the affembly to pulling up the flood-gates for this inundation of fraud, are unanswered; but they are thoroughly refuted by an hundred thousand financiers in the ffreet. These are the numbers by which the metaphysic arithmeticians compute. These are the grand calculations on which a philosophical public credit is founded in France. They cannot raife supplies; but they can raife mobs. Let them rejoice in the applauses of the club at Dundee, for their wisdom and patriotism in having thus applied the plunder of the citizens to the service of the state. I hear of no address upon this subject from the directors of the Bank of England; though their approbation would be of a little more weight in the scale of credit than that of the club at Dundee, But, to do justice to the

the club, I believe the gentlemen who compose it to be wiser than they appear; that they will be less liberal of their money than of their addresses; and that they would not give a dog's-ear of their most rumpled and ragged Scotch paper for twenty of your fairest assignats.

Early in this year the affembly iffued paper to the amount of fixteen millions sterling: What must have been the state into which the assembly has brought your affairs, that the relief afforded by fo vast a supply has been hardly perceptible? This paper also felt an almost immediate depreciation of five per cent, which in little time came to about feven. The effect of these affignats on the receipt of the revenue is remarkable. Mr. Necker found that the collectors of the revenue, who received in coin, paid the treasury in assignats. The collectors made feven per cent. by thus receiving in money, and accounting in depreciated paper. It was not very difficult to foresee, that this must be inevitable. It was, however, not the less embarraffing. Mr. Necker was obliged (I believe, for a confiderable part, in the market of London) to buy gold and filver for the mint, which amounted to about twelve thousand pounds above the value of the commodity gained. That minister was of opinion, that whatever their fecret nutritive virtue might be, the flate could not live upon affignats alone; that fome real filver was neceffary, particularly for the fatisfaction of those, who having iron in their hands, were not likely to diffinguish themselves for patience, when they should perceive that whilst an encrease of pay was held out to them in real money, it was again to be fraudulently drawn back by depreciated paper. The minister, in this very natural diffrefs, applied to the affembly, that they should order the collectors to pay in specie what in specie they had received. It could not escape him, that if the treasury paid 3 per cent, for the use of a currency, which should be returned feven per cent, worfe than the minifter iffued it, fuch a dealing could not very greatly tend to enrich the public. The affembly took no notice of his recommendation. They were in this dilemma-If they continued to receive the affignats, cash must become an alien to their treasury: If the treasury should refuse those paper amulets, or should discountenance them in any degree, they must destroy the credit of their sole resource. They feem then to have made their option; and to have given some fort of credit to their paper by taking it themselves; at the same time in their speeches they made a fort of swaggering declaration, fomething, I rather think, above legislative competence; that is, that there is no difference in value between metallic money and their affignats. This was a good flout proof article of faith, pronounced under an anathema, by the venerable fathers of this philofophic fynod. Credat who will-certainly not Judaus Apella.

A noble indignation rifes in the minds of your popular leaders, on hearing the magic lanthorn in their shew of finance compared to the fraudulent exhibitions of Mr. Law. They cannot bear to hear the sands of his Mississippi compared with the rock of the church, on which they build their system. Pray let them suppress this glorious spirit, until they shew to the world what piece of solid ground ground there is for their affignats, which they have not pre-occupied by other charges. They do injustice to that great, mother fraud, to compare it with their degenerate imitation. It is not true, that Law built folely on a speculation concerning the Mississippi. He added the East India trade: he added the African trade; he added the farms of all the farmed revenue of France. All these together unquestionably could not support the structure which the public enthusiasm, not he, chose to build upon these bases. But these were, however, in comparifon, generous delufions. They supposed, and they aimed at an increase of the commerce of France. They opened to it the whole range of the two hemispheres. They did not think of feeding France from its own fubstance. A grand imagination found in this flight of commerce fomething to captivate. It was wherewithal to dazzle the eye of an eagle. It was not made to entice the fmell of a mole, nuzzling and burying himself in his mother earth, as yours is. Men were not then quite shrunk from their natural dimensions by a degrading and fordid philosophy, and fitted for low and vulgar deceptions. Above all remember, that in imposing on the imagination, the then managers of the fystem made a compliment to the freedom of men. In their fraud there was no mixture of force. This was referved to our time, to quench the little glimmerings of reason which might break in upon the folid darkness of this enlightened age.

On recollection, I have faid nothing of a scheme of finance which may be urged in favour of the abilities of these gentlemen, and which has been introduced with great pomp, though not yet finally adopted in the national affembly. It comes with fomething folid in aid of the credit of the paper circulation; and much has been faid of its utility and its elegance. I mean the project for coining into money the bells of the suppressed churches. This is their alchymy. There are some follies which baffle argument; which go beyond ridicule; and which excite no feeling in us but disgust; and therefore I say no more upon it.

It is as little worth remarking any farther upon all their drawing and re-drawing, on their circulation for putting off the evil day, on the play between the treafury and the Caiffe d'Escompte, and on all these old exploded contrivances of mercantile fraud, now exalted into policy of state. The revenue will not be trifled The prattling about the rights of men will not be accepted in payment for a biscuit or a pound of gunpowder. Here then the metaphylicians descend from their airy speculations, and faithfully follow examples. What examples? the examples of bankrupts. But, defeated, baffled, difgraced, when their breath, their strength, their inventions, their fancies defert them, their confidence still maintains its ground. In the manifest failure of their abilities they take credit for their benevolence. When the revenue disappears in their hands, they have the prefumption, in some of their late proceedings, to value themselves on the relief given to the people. They did not relieve the people. If they entertained fuch intentions, why did they order the obnoxious taxes to be paid? The people relieved themselves in fpite of the affembly.

But waving all discussion on the parties, who may claim the merit of this fallacious relief, has

there

there been, in effect, any relief to the people in any form? Mr. Bailly, one of the grand agents of paper circulation, lets you into the nature of this relief. His speech to the National Assembly contained an high and laboured panegyric on the inhabitants of Paris for the constancy and unbroken resolution with which they have borne their diffress and misery. A fine picture of public felicity! What! great courage and unconquerable firmness of mind to endure benefits, and fustain redress! One would think from the speech of this learned Lord Mayor, that the Parifians, for this twelvemonth past, had been suffering the straits of some dreadful blockade; that Henry the Fourth had been stopping up the avenues to their fupply, and Sully thundering with his ordnance at the gates of Paris; when in reality they are befieged by no other enemies than their own madness and folly, their own credulity and perverseness. But Mr. Bailly will fooner thaw the eternal ice of his atlantic regions, than reftore the central heat to Paris, whilst it remains " fmitten with the cold, dry, petrifick mace" of a false and unfeeling philosophy. Some time after this speech, that is, on the thirteenth of last August, the same magistrate, giving an account of his government at the bar of the fame affembly, expresses himself as follows: " In the month " of July 1789," [the period of everlasting commemoration] " the finances of the city of Paris " were yet in good order; the expenditure was " counterbalanced by the receipt, and she had at " that time a million [forty thousand pounds sterof ling | in bank, The expences which she has been . " constrained Aa3 constrained to incur, subsequent to the revolution, " amount to 2,500,000 livres. From these ex-" pences, and the great falling off in the product " of the free gifts, not only a momentary but a " total want of money has taken place." This is the Paris upon whose nourishment, in the course of the last year, such immense sums, drawn from the vitals of all France, has been expended. As long as Paris stands in the place of antient Rome, fo long fhe will be maintained by the fubject provinces. It is an evil inevitably attendant on the dominion of fovereign democratic republics. As it happened in Rome, it may furvive that republican domination which gave rife to it. In that case despotism itself must submit to the vices of popularity. Rome, under her emperors, united the evils of both fystems; and this unnatural combination was one great cause of her ruin.

To tell the people that they are relieved by the dilapidation of their public estate, is a cruel and infolent imposition. Statesmen, before they valued themselves on the relief given to the people, by the destruction of their revenue, ought first to have carefully attended to the folution of this problem:-Whether it be more advantageous to the people to pay confiderably, and to gain in proportion; or to gain little or nothing, and to be disburthened of all contribution? My mind is made up to decide in favour of the first proposition. Experience is with me, and, I believe, the best opinions also. To keep a balance between the power of acquisition on the part of the fubject, and the demands he is to answer on the part of the state, is a fundamental part of the skill of a true politician.

tician. The means of acquifition are prior in time and in arrangement. Good order is the foundation of all good things. To be enabled to acquire, the people, without being fervile, must be tractable and obedient. The magistrate must have his reverence, the laws their authority. The body of the people must not find the principles of natural fubordination by art rooted out of their minds. They must respect that property of which they cannot partake. They must labour to obtain what by labour can be obtained; and when they find, as they commonly do, the fuccess disproportioned to the endeavour, they must be taught their confolation in the final proportions of eternal justice. Of this confolation, whoever deprives them, deadens their industry, and strikes at the root of all acquisition as of all confervation. He that does this is the cruel oppressor, the merciless enemy of the poor and wretched; at the fame time that by his wicked speculations he exposes the fruits of successful industry, and the accumulations of fortune, to the plunder of the negligent, the disappointed, and the unprosperous.

Too many of the financiers by profession are apt to see nothing in revenue, but banks, and circulations, and annuities on lives, and tontines, and perpetual rents, and all the small wares of the shop. In a settled order of the state, these things are not to be slighted, nor is the skill in them to be held of trivial estimation. They are good, but then only good, when they assume the effects of that settled order, and are built upon it. But when men think that these beggarly contrivances may supply a resource for the evils which result from breaking up the foundations foundations of public order, and from causing or fuffering the principles of property to be subverted, they will, in the ruin of their country, leave a melancholy and lasting monument of the effect of preposterous politics, and presumptuous, short-fighted, narrow-minded wisdom.

The effects of the incapacity shewn by the popular leaders in all the great members of the commonwealth are to be covered with the "all-atoning name" of liberty. In some people I see great liberty indeed; in many, if not in the most, an oppressive degrading fervitude. But what is liberty without wisdom, and without virtue? It is the greatest of all possible evils; for it is folly, vice, and madness, without tuition or reftraint. Those who know what virtuous liberty is, cannot bear to fee it difgraced by incapable heads, on account of their having high-founding words in their mouths. Grand, swelling sentiments of liberty, I am fure I do not despise. They warm the heart; they enlarge and liberalife our minds; they animate our courage in a time of conflict. Old as I am, I read the fine raptures of Lucan and Corneille with pleafure. Neither do I wholly condemn the little arts and devices of popularity. They facilitate the carrying of many points of moment; they keep the people together; they refresh the mind in its exertions; and they diffuse occasional gaiety over the fevere brow of moral freedom. Every politician ought to facrifice to the graces; and to join compliance with reason. But in such an undertaking as that in France, all these subsidiary sentiments and artifices are of little avail. To make a government requires no great prudence. Settle the feat of power; teach obedience: and the work is done.

To give freedom is still more easy. It is not necessary to guide; it only requires to let go the rein. But to form a free government; that is, to temper together these opposite elements of liberty and restraint in one consistent work, requires much thought, deep reflection, a fagacious, powerful, and combining mind. This I do not find in those who take the lead in the national affembly. Perhaps they are not fo miserably deficient as they appear. I rather believe it. It would put them below the common level of human understanding. But when the leaders choose to make themselves bidders at an auction of popularity, their talents, in the construction of the state, will be of no service. They will become flatterers inftead of legislators; the inftruments, not the guides of the people. If any of them should happen to propose a scheme of liberty, foberly limited, and defined with proper qualifications, he will be immediately outbid by his competitors, who will produce fomething more fplendidly popular. Suspicions will be raised of his fidelity to his cause. Moderation will be stigmatized as the virtue of cowards; and compromise as the prudence of traitors; until, in hopes of preferving the credit which may enable him to temper and moderate on some occasions, the popular leader is obliged to become active in propagating doctrines, and establishing powers, that will afterwards defeat any fober purpose at which he ultimately might have aimed.

But am I so unreasonable as to see nothing at all that deserves commendation in the indesatigable labours of this assembly? I do not deny that among an infinite number of acts of violence and

o folly,

folly, fome good may have been done. They who destroy every thing certainly will remove some grievance. They who make every thing new, have a chance that they may establish something beneficial. To give them credit for what they have done in virtue of the authority they have usurped, or which can excuse them in the crimes by which that authority has been acquired, it must appear, that the fame things could not have been accomplished without producing fuch a revolution. Most affuredly they might; because almost every one of the regulations made by them, which is not very equivocal, was either in the cession of the king, voluntarily made at the meeting of the states, or in the concurrent instructions to the orders. Some usages have been abolished on just grounds; but they were fuch that if they had flood as they were to all eternity, they would little detract from the happiness and prosperity of any state. The improvements of the national affembly are fuperficial, their errors fundamental.

Whatever they are, I wish my countrymen rather to recommend to our neighbours the example of the British constitution, than to take models from them for the improvement of our own. In the former they have got an invaluable treasure. They are not, I think, without some causes of apprehension and complaint; but these they do not owe to their constitution, but to their own conduct. I think our happy situation owing to our constitution; but owing to the whole of it, and not to any part singly; owing in a great measure to what we have left standing in our several reviews and reformations, as well as to what we have altered or superadded. Our people people will find employment enough for a truly patriotic, free, and independent spirit, in guarding what they possess, from violation. I would not exclude alteration neither; but even when I changed, it should be to preserve. I should be led to my remedy by a great grievance. In what I did, I should follow the example of our ancestors. I would make the reparation as nearly as possible in the style of the building. A politic caution, a guarded circumspection, a moral rather than a complexional timidity were among the ruling principles of our forefathers in their most decided conduct. Not being illuminated with the light of which the gentlemen of France tell us they have got fo abundant a share, they acted under a strong impression of the ignorance and fallibility of mankind. He that had made them thus fallible, rewarded them for having in their conduct attended to their nature. Let us imitate their caution, if we wish to deserve their fortune, or to retain their bequests. Let us add, if we please, but let us preserve what they have left; and, standing on the firm ground of the British conftitution, let us be fatisfied to admire rather than attempt to follow in their desperate flights the aëronauts of France.

I have told you candidly my fentiments. I think they are not likely to alter yours. I do not know that they ought. You are young; you cannot guide, but must follow the fortune of your country. But hereafter they may be of some use to you, in some suture form which your commonwealth may take. In the present it can hardly remain; but before its final settlement it may be obliged to pass, as one of our poets says, "through great varieties of untried being," and in all its transmigrations to be purified by fire and blood.

I have little to recommend my opinions, but long observation and much impartiality. They come from one who has been no tool of power, no flatterer of greatness; and who in his last acts does not wish to belye the tenour of his life. They come from one, almost the whole of whose public exertion has been a struggle for the liberty of others; from one in whose breast no anger durable or vehement has ever been kindled, but by what he confidered as tyranny; and who fnatches from his share in the endeavours which are used by good men to discredit opulent oppression, the hours he has employed on your affairs; and who in fo doing perfuades himfelf he has not departed from his usual office: they come from one who defires honours, distinctions, and emoluments, but little; and who expects them not at all; who has no contempt for fame, and no fear of obloquy; who shuns contention, though he will hazard an opinion: from one who wishes to preserve consistency: but who would preferve confiftency by varying his means to fecure the unity of his end; and, when the equipoife of the veffel in which he fails, may be endangered by overloading it upon one fide, is defirous of carrying the fmall weight of his reasons to that which may preserve its equipoise.
